

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY

---

THE MODERN PART
OF AN Universal History,
FROM THE Earliest ACCOUNT of TIME.
VOL. XXI.

---

WOL V34
218A
WOL

THE

MODERN

OF

Universal History

FROM

THE ACCOUNT OF THE

VOL. III.

THE MODERN PART
OF AN Universal History,

FROM THE Earliest ACCOUNT of TIME.

Compiled from ORIGINAL WRITERS.

---

By the AUTHORS of the ANTIENT PART.

---

VOL. XXI.

---

---

LONDON:

Printed for S. RICHARDSON, T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH, A. MILLAR, JOHN RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER,
B. LAW and Co. T. LONGMAN, and C. WARE.

M.DCC.LX.

УЧЕБНИК
АРИТМЕТИКИ
ДЛЯ
УЧЕНИКОВ
СРЕДНИХ ШКОЛ

ЧАСТЬ I

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

ЧАСТЬ I

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

АРИТМЕТИКА

---

---

Modern History:

BEING A

CONTINUATION

OF THE

Universal History.

---

BOOK XIX.

---

CHAP. I.

---

SECT. X.

The History of Arragon continued, from the Reign of Don Alonfo II. to its Conjunction with the Kingdom of Majorca, including also the Conquest of the Kingdom of Valencia.

THE young king of Arragon, Don Alonfo the fe-Don Alon-cond, was, at the time his mother put him into II. his possession of his dominions, entering into the character;
twelfth year of his age; and, therefore, without entrance doubt, there was a kind of regency appointed to manage on his adpublic affairs, till he attained a proper age to take the ministra-reins of government into his own hands. He was a young tion, and prince of pregnant parts, one of whom great hopes were gallant be-conceived by his subjects in his earlier years, and who lived haviour not barely to accomplish their hopes, but to exceed them. in Provence.
He had very strong abilities, much industry and activity, a sincere zeal for religion, with less of bigotry than any prince of his time, active and enterprizing in war, prudent in Mod. Hist. Vol. XXI. B peace,

A. D.
1166.

peace, modest and grave in his deportment, and so free from all suspicion of lewdness, that he obtained the surname of, the Chaste. The first action of his life distinguished plainly his spirit and capacity; for Raymond, count of Provence, to whose care he was chiefly committed by the queen, his mother, repairing into that country, projected a marriage for his only daughter, Donna Dulce, with the son of the count of Tholouse, and, falling out soon after with the count de Forcalquier, marched with a considerable body of troops, in order to make himself master of Nice; at the siege of which he received a wound in his head, of which he died <sup>a</sup>. Raymond, count of Tholouse, thought to avail himself of that alliance, which is before mentioned, and meant to have taken possession of that country; but Don Alonso of Arragon, who was scarce entered into his fifteenth year, prevented him: for, being at Gironne, when the news came of Don Raymond Berenger's death, he immediately took the title of marquis of Provence, and sent a body of troops to secure the possession of it <sup>b</sup>. But, before he would go thither in person, he called an assembly of the states at Saragossa, where, in the most solemn manner, he confirmed the liberties of the clergy and nobility. Having obtained all the assistance he could desire, he went and put himself at the head of his troops in Provence, gave battle to the count of Tholouse, and obtained the victory. To strengthen his party, he had repudiated his wife Constance, who was the daughter of Lewis the younger, king of France, that married the widow of count Raymond Berenger, yet the king carried his point, brought over the clergy, nobility, and people to his interests, and, some time after, placed his brother Don Pedro there, to whom he gave the title of count, and who, to render himself popular, assumed the name of Raymond Berenger, though he held it only in the name, and during the pleasure of the king his brother <sup>c</sup>.

Enters into a war
with the Moors,
and drives
them out of all the places they

AFTER his return into his own dominions, perceiving that the rest of the Christian princes in Spain were enlarging their dominions, at the expence of the infidels, he thought it a convenient season for him to do the same: and, having assembled a numerous army, he employed it in sweeping the towns which the Moors still held on the south-east side of the Ebro, which were equally troublesome to the kingdom of Arragon, and the principality of Catalonia. Accordingly, he took Tavera, Moella, Pena, Rubia, and Monroy. From thence advancing to Caspe, which was a place of strength, the inhabitants were so intimidated that they opened their gates, on the first appearance of his troops; and Alcanez, which was a place of still greater strength, surrendered in like manner; so that, without meeting much resistance, the king pushed his conquests, this campaign, as far as Cantavieja<sup>d</sup>. To prevent their being lost, as easily as they were obtained, he gave Caspe to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and, some years after, Alcanez to the knights of Calatrava, by whom they were well fortified, so as to cover all the conquered country<sup>e</sup>. The king, Don Alonso of Castile, conceiving a high opinion of this young monarch, they entered into a close alliance offensive and defensive; and, according to the custom of those times, put into each other's hands a certain number of fortresses, by way of security, for the due performance of the treaty<sup>f</sup>. About the same time, the Mohammedans, in the mountains of Prades, took up arms, in hopes of throwing off the yoke of Arragon; but the king, causing them to be attacked on all sides, forced them to return to their obedience, not without effusion of blood.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire de Languedoc, liv. ix. Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. <sup>b</sup> Hieronymi Blancæ Arragonensium Rerum Commentarii, Zurita. <sup>c</sup> Histoire de Languedoc, liv. ix.

THE city of Tervel, standing on the confluence of the rivers Alhambra and Guadalaviar, which some have represented as a terrestrial paradise, nature having favoured the plain, in which it stands, with a perpetual spring, had been long the object of his wishes, and he took this opportunity to invest it, when the Moors had so many irons in the fire, that he obtained it without any great loss: and, besides annexing so fine a city, in so valuable a territory, to the crown of Arragon, it gave him an open passage into the kingdom of Valentia<sup>g</sup>. Don Alonso quickly improved this advantage by surprizing the town of Xativa, a place of great importance, but which would, in all probability, have been only the beginning of his conquests, if he had not been interrupted by the news of an unexpected invasion of his dominions, by Don Sanchez the sixth of Navarre. This obliged him to turn his arms on that side; previous to which he had an interview with the king of Castile, who had also what is now stiled

the kingdom of Arragon.
A. D.
1168.

1170

His irruption into Valentia,
where he reduces the cities of Tervel
and Xativa.

1171

<sup>d</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA Historia general de España, lib. xi.
<sup>e</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Arragonensium Rerum Commentarii, FERRERAS. <sup>f</sup> ZURITA Privileg. et Chart. plur. <sup>g</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MARIANA Historia general de España, lib. xi.

A. D.
1172.

broke with the king of Navarre, in which a new convention was made ; for the due performance of which the Castilian put into his hands the castle of Bordejo, and Ariza was consigned to him by the king of Arragon. In pursuance of their agreement, they both invaded Navarre, but Don Sanchez was so well provided, that they gained very little except blows. On the eighteenth of October died the queen Donna Petronilla, who, from the time of her resigning the crown, had employed her revenues in charity, and her time in acts of piety and devotion <sup>b</sup>. The people of Arragon have still an high regard for her memory.

Sends embassadors to demand the princess Eudocia, daughter to the Greek emperor Manuel, and afterwards marries Donna Sancha of Castile.

A. D.
1173.
1174.
1175.
1176.

THE king of Navarre, to revenge the insult of the preceding year, when Don Alonso had wasted his country with fire and sword, made an irruption into Arragon, and made himself master, after a long siege, of Cajuelos, while Don Alonso, on his side, entered Navarre, and took Milagro, which he demolished. Towards the close of the year, a dispute arose between the kings of Castile and Arragon, an officer belonging to the former having surprized the castle of Ariza, which, as we have shewn, had been put into the hands of the king of Arragon as a cautionary place ; which act of injustice he resented so highly, that he sent embassadors to Constantinople to demand in marriage the princess Eudocia, daughter of the Greek emperor Manuel, notwithstanding he had been contracted, in his father's lifetime to Donna Sancha, daughter to the emperor Alonso, aunt to the king of Castile, and sister to the king of Leon <sup>1</sup>. This was certainly a very rash, and indeed the most imprudent and blameable action of his whole life ; of which being soon made sensible by the pope's legate cardinal Hyacinth, he departed from the project he had formed, and, as we have shewn in another place, made his peace with those powerful monarchs, by marrying Donna Sancha <sup>k</sup>. Soon after he gave his sister Donna Dulce in marriage to the infant Don Sancho of Portugal <sup>l</sup>. The war with Navarre, having been attended with the most pernicious consequences to the Christian interests in Spain, all the three kings were, at length, prevailed on to submit their differences to the judgment of the king of England. This prudent resolution gave Don Alonso an opportunity of making a tour into Provence, where his dispute with the count of Tholouse remained still undetermined, but was, at length, amicably composed, after an interview between the two princes, by a treaty in which the pretensions of both parties were finally adjusted; and yet the calm lasted not long.

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA Privileg. et Chart. plur. MARIANA Ferreras.
<sup>1</sup> ZURITA Chron. Jacobi Regis. MARIANA Historia general de Espana, lib. xi. <sup>k</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum, FERRERAS. <sup>l</sup> BRANDAON Privileg. plur.

AT his return into his own dominions, he found the king of Castile engaged in a very unequal war with the Moors, who had brought a prodigious army together, in order to oblige him to raise the siege of Cuenca. At the request of that monarch, he marched, with a great body of troops, to his assistance, and had a large share in that glorious victory obtained over the infidels, near that city: upon which, the king of Castile, as a mark of his gratitude and respect, released him from that homage which had been exacted from the crown of Arragon, by his grandfather, for the territories he held on the south side of the Èbro m. The king of Arragon made after this an incursion into Valentia, and obliged the Moors in that country to become his vassals. Upon some fresh provocation, he entered that country again with his forces, and had penetrated as far as Morvedro, which place while he besieged he had news of some troubles that had arisen in the county of Roussillon, which had devolved to him in virtue of a family contract with Guinard, the last hereditary prince of that country. This obliged him to raise the siege, and to march thither with an army, where, having settled things to his satisfaction, and fortified the important town of Perpignan, he returned into Arragon, and held an assembly of the states at Huesca, where he received the ambassadors of Ferdinand, king of Leon, who came to demand his assistance against his nephew, the king of Castile. Don Alonso gave them good words, but talked in so high a stile to his brother-in-law, that he obliged him to conclude a peace with the king of Leon, and, at the same time, they agreed between themselves, that the conquest of Valentia should be left to Arragon, and that of Murcia to Castile n.

Assists in the glorious battle of Cuenca, as an ally to the king of Castile, who thereupon remits his homage.
A. D. 1177.

1178.

SOME new disputes having arisen with the count of Thoulouse, the king of Arragon went again into France, where the viscount of Niemes, and the viscount of Carcaſſon, volun-

Great exploits performed by

<sup>m</sup> ZURITA Hist. de Languedoc. Annal. Toletan. RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LUCÆ Tudens. Chron. Annal. Complut. <sup>n</sup> Indices Rerum ab Aragoniæ regibus Gestarum. PETR. DE MARCA, MARCA Hispanica, five limes Hispanicus, i. e. geographica & historica Descriptio Catalauniæ; a STEPH. BALUZIO edita. Paris. 1688. fo.

him in Spain, and in France, against his enemies, and for the preservation of his dominions. rarely did homage to him, and entered into a close alliance against the count of Tholouse. About this time, the archbishop of Tarragona, metropolitan of Catalonia, abolished, in all the dioceses under his jurisdiction, the practice of computing by the æra of Spain, and introduced that of our Lord. This regulation was made in the year one thousand two hundred and eighteen of the old æra P. The war with the count of Tholouse still continued, and what gave inexpressible grief to the king of Arragon, his brother

- A. D. count Raymond Berenger was most barbarously assassinated upon Easter-day, and his remains buried in the cathedral of Maguelonne. To punish this cruel act as it deserved, the king marched thither with a formidable army, and, understanding that the murderers were retired into the fortress of Moruele, he caused it to be suddenly invested, and, refusing to hear of any capitulation, it was taken by assault, and all who were in it put without mercy to the sword. After this act of exemplary justice, he made an irruption into the territory of Tholouse; and, the campaign being over, he made a tour to Bordeaux, where he had an interview with Henry the second, king of England, with whom he concluded an alliance. The war with the count of Tholouse continued two years longer: at the end of which, both parties being weary, they had another interview, in which they renewed the treaty that had been concluded eight years before. At his return into his own dominions, he held an assembly of the states at Huesca, where he regulated several disorders that had happened during his absence, and applied himself with great diligence to the improvement of his territories; in order to which, he granted large privileges to the places lately conquered. Two years after, he had an interview with the king of Navarre, in the month of September, at Boraja, where they made a solid peace, and gave reciprocal securities for the strict performance of it; by putting into the hands of a neutral power certain fortresses of importance.

The residue of his generous and gallant actions to the end of his reign. THE power of the king of Castile was so great at this time, that, as some writers say, the king of Arragon found it necessary to negotiate a defensive alliance with the crowns of Navarre and Leon; which is so much the more probable, because, upon the king of Castile's making an inroad

• Histoire de Languedoc. MARCA Hispanica. • Chron. RIVIBUL. MARCA Hispanica. • Histoire de Languedoc. • MARCA Hispanica. • ZURITA. • MARCA Hispaniæ. ZURITA FERRERAS.

upon the country last mentioned, Don Alonso immediately declared war against him, and made an irruption into Castile; of which that monarch had no sooner intelligence than he entered Arragon, on the side of Agreda; but, in his retreat, Don Alonso met and fought him with some advantage: however, by the interposition of the pope's legate they were thoroughly reconciled. The count de Tholouse having committed hostilities in Gascony, during the absence of Richard, king of England, in the Holy Land, Don Alonso not only sent the succours stipulated by treaty, but went in person into Provence, to prevent that monarch's affairs from suffering by his absence. While he was thus employed, queen Berengera, consort to king Richard, arrived at Marseilles; and, after having been splendidly entertained for some time by Don Alonso, was safely conducted into Aquitaine <sup>w</sup>. While he remained in these parts, the king founded a noble monastery, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, not far from the city of Arles; and, having settled every thing in the best manner he was able, he committed the care of his dominions in France to his brother Don Sancho, and then returned into Arragon <sup>x</sup>. The king of Castile having embroiled himself again with the monarchs of Navarre and Leon, the king of Arragon resumed his old character of a mediator, and prevailed upon all these princes to consent to an interview with him, between Agreda and Tarracona, where a suspension of arms was concluded <sup>y</sup>. This was the last great act of his life; for his affairs obliging him to make a journey into Roussillon, he was seized with a fever at Perpignan, where he ended his life, April the twenty-sixth, one thousand one hundred and ninety-six, when he had lived forty-four, and reigned thirty-four years compleat <sup>z</sup>. He was without question one of the wisest, bravest, and most fortunate princes that ever sat upon the throne of Arragon. His body was interred, by his express command, in the monastery of Tolet, which was of his own foundation. He left by his queen Donna Sancha three sons, Don Pedro, to whom he left the kingdom of Arragon, the principality of Catalonia, and the county of Roussillon; Don Alonso, to whom he gave the county of Provence; and Don Ferdinand, who was abbot of Montarragon: and also three daughters, Donna Constantia,

A. D.
1193.

1194.

1196,

<sup>w</sup> HOVEDEN Annal.      <sup>x</sup> D'ACHERI, tom. iii. fo. 168.
<sup>y</sup> P. MORBT. Investigaciones Historicas de las Antiquidades del Reyno de Navarra.      <sup>z</sup> Chron. RIVIPUL. Chron. Primat. Annal. Toletan. ZURITA. HIERONYMI BLANCE.

who espoused the king of Hungary; Donna Leonora, and Donna Sancha <sup>a</sup>.

Don Pedro THE young king Don Pedro had a high spirit, strong the second passions, was less firm, in his resolutions, less correct in his succeeds his manners, and, consequently, less happy and fortunate than father; his his father. He began his reign with holding an assembly character; of the states; in which he did some popular things, in order methods to conciliate the affections of his people. The year follow- pursued by ing he made some severe laws against heretics, that he might him in ci- ing he made some severe laws against heretics, that he might vil and ingratiate himself with the clergy, and very chearfully assist ecclesiasti- ed the king of Castile against the infidels. The counts of cal affairs Urgel and of Foix, having been long at variance, broke out at the en- into an open war; which proving extremely detrimental to trance on his subjects in Catalonia, the king went into that principa- his admi- lity, called an assembly of the states, dictated therein the nistration. terms of peace, and took the proper measures for enforcing them <sup>b</sup>.

A. D.

1197.

1198.

1199.

1200.

The next year, some disputes arose between this monarch and the queen-dowager his mother, to whom several places on the frontiers were assigned by his father's will; by which Don Pedro thought his dominions too much exposed: but, by the interposition of the king of Castile, this difference was compromised, the queen consenting to restore these fortresses, and the king giving her an equivalent for them in the heart of his dominions <sup>c</sup>. The king of Navarre going at this time to the court of Morocco, it so much alarmed his neighbours, that both the king of Castile and the king of Arragon invaded his dominions, and made themselves masters of such places as were most for their respective conveniencies <sup>d</sup>. The king Don Pedro observing, that some inconveniencies had arisen, and others increased of late, in his dominions, called an assembly of the states; in which the necessary measures were taken for repressing them, and all who were present sworn to the strict observance of them. At the same time, he contracted his sister Donna Leonora to the count of Tholouse; which marriage was consummated about three years after: at which time, as some writers say, his other sister married the heir of that count <sup>e</sup>.

He con- clude marriage with the count of

THE king of Arragon, having amicably regulated the limits of their respective dominions with the king of Castile, and being frustrated in his view of marrying the infanta of Navarre, took a sudden resolution of espousing Donna

<sup>a</sup> MARIANA. FERRERAS. ZURITA. <sup>b</sup> MARCA Hispanica. RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LUCÆ Tudens. Chron. <sup>c</sup> ZURITA. Chron. var. Antiq. <sup>d</sup> RODERIC TOLET. de rebus Hispan. <sup>e</sup> ZURITA Chron. var. Antiq.

C. I. The History of Arragon.

Maria, the only daughter of William, count of Montpellier, Montpel-
 by the Greek princess Eudocia, whom his father should have married: and this notwithstanding that lady had been married to the count de Comminges; from whom, under pretence of his having another wife, she was divorced, after having had two daughters by him. While the king was at Montpellier, in order to the conclusion of this marriage, he engaged his brother Don Alonso, count of Provence, to submit the disputes that had arisen between him and his wife's grandfather, the count de Forcolquier, to an arbitration, under which all things were settled, for the present, by the king's interposition<sup>1</sup>. After this, Don Pedro formed and executed a very extraordinary project, which was that of going to Rome, to make a visit to the pope, embarking with his uncle Don Sancho, and a numerous train of prelates and lords on board his own galleys. He was received by the pontiff with all possible marks of kindness and respect, anointed by the bishop of Porto, crowned by the pope's own hands; for which, departing from the maxims of his predecessors, he acknowledged himself a vassal to the holy see, and consented to an annual tribute of two hundred and fifty double pistoles; and, having received some papal favours and exemptions, he then returned into Provence<sup>2</sup>. At his arrival there, he found the quarrel between his brother and the count de Forcolquier broke out afresh, and that the former, surprized by the latter, was held close prisoner in a castle, till he should comply with what was demanded from him. The king, incensed at this behaviour, raised a considerable army, besieged and took the castle in which his brother was confined; and, having set him at liberty, ravaged the territories of his antagonist, till, by the interposition of neighbouring princes, things were once more amicably composed<sup>3</sup>. The king, about this time, had some differences with the people of Montpellier, whom he looked upon as his subjects, in right of his wife. In Arragon, also, there were great discontents on the score of the king's submitting himself to the pope; against which the states protested, being unwilling to owe allegiance to more than one sovereign<sup>4</sup>.

ABOUT this time, the king, who had no issue, began to be displeased with the queen, and aimed at procuring a divorce from Rome; which, he flattered himself, would be no

Begins to dislike the queen; institutes a

<sup>1</sup> D'ACHERI, tom. viii. fo. 216. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Aragonensium Rerum Commentarii. Histoire de Languedoc.
<sup>2</sup> Chron. RYVIFUL. RAINALD. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.
<sup>3</sup> Chron. Primat. <sup>4</sup> ZURITA Histoire de Languedoc.

suit at difficult thing to obtain from a pope, who had honoured Rome for him with the title of Catholic; in which, however, he in divorce; found himself much mistaken, and his interest far weaker and, du- than he had imagined. He was also not a little embarrass- ring the sed in his domestic affairs, which induced him to call an progress of assembly of the states, and to make some edicts in favour of that suit, the clergy; and also to make an irruption into the territo- has a son ries of the Moors, where he made himself master of the by her. town of Montalban <sup>k</sup>. He consented, at the request of the king of Castile, who had lately concluded a peace with the king of Navarre, to an interview with the last mentioned monarch: at which, through the interposition of the former, he compromised all disputes with the latter <sup>l</sup>. All this time, his suit for a divorce went on, but, as some say, he was prevailed on by one of his favourites to make the queen a visit, and to remain some time with her; and that, soon after his departure, she declared herself with child. Others, amongst whom we may reckon Mariana, give another and less honourable turn to this story: they assure us, that the queen, taking the advantage of the king's disposition to gallantry, prevailed upon a servant of his to conduct her privately to his bed; which he did: but, in the morning, she took care to make herself known, that, in case of her being with child, there might be no doubt of its legitimacy <sup>n</sup>. However this business was conducted, certain it is, that the queen was delivered of a son, on the first of February <sup>o</sup>, whom she christened Don Jayme, from another strange incident. She caused twelve wax tapers to be lighted at a time, and having given the name of an apostle to each of them, bestowed that of St. James on her new-born son, because his taper burnt the longest. Such were the foolish superstitions of this age, with the repetition of which the reader will more easily bear, if he considers, that it is some comfort to find we live in an age more enlightened.

A. D.

1206.

1207.

1208.

Owenshim, andgives di-rection forhis beingeducatedin a man-ner suita-ble to hisdignity.

It does not at all appear, that the king Don Pedro had the least scruple or suspicion of imposture in this affair, but from his birth acknowledged the infant for his son; and, as we shall see hereafter, directed all necessary care to be taken of his education. Don Armingol, count of Urgel, dying without male issue, his sister's son Don Gerard de Cabrera took possession of his dominions; without demanding the consent of the king of Arragon; from whom they were held as dependent on his principality of Catalonia. Don Pedro was not a prince to be treated in this manner with impunity; he, therefore, presently vindicated his right by attacking the new count; and having, after a long siege, reduced the castle, in which he took shelter with his family, he sent them all prisoners to that of Loharra P. His sister Donna Constantia, queen-dowager of Hungary, who returned home into his dominions on the death of her husband, having contracted a second marriage with Frederic, king of Sicily, was conducted by the king of Arragon to Barcelona; where she embarked for that island, accompanied by her brother Don Alonso, count of Provence; who died very soon after their arrival at Palermo <sup>9</sup>. In the month of November, the same year, deceased the queen-dowager Donna Sancha, the king's mother, who had passed the latter part of her life in a convent, and in exercises of charity and devotion; all the disputes she had with her son being buried in oblivion.

<sup>k</sup> RAINALD. ZURITA. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. MARCA Hispanica. MARIANA Historia general de España, lib. xii.

<sup>l</sup> ZURITA. MARCA Hispanica. <sup>n</sup> Histoire general de España, lib. xii. <sup>o</sup> Histoire de Languedoc, tom. iii. p. xiv. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.

THE king of Castile, meditating the subversion of the Moorish monarchies in Spain, proposed a fresh interview between the kings of Arragon and Navarre, at a place called Malens, where all the three kings were present; and where, as a proof of their thorough reconciliation, the king of Navarre lent Don Pedro of Arragon twenty thousand pistoles, for which he had a pressing occasion; and received from him certain fortresses to secure the repayment of it <sup>1</sup>. It is probable, that the original intention of this loan was to enable the king of Arragon to take the field against the Moors; from which he was prevented by being obliged to take a share in those strange transactions that were carrying on in the southern provinces of France; where the pope's general, Simon, count de Montfort, under colour of a crusade, published for that purpose, was endeavouring to extirpate the Albigois, better known to us by their Latin name of Albigenses; who were in reality Protestants, holding, by a continued and uninterrupted tradition, the doctrines of the ancient Gothic church; and for this exposed to the rage of the pope, who proclaimed a crusade for their present destruction; and established the bloody tribunal of the inquisition to prevent their sentiments from being received. These

The king makes a tour on an extraordinary occasion into his French dominions.

A. D.
1209.

<sup>P</sup> Chron. var. Antiq.    <sup>9</sup> ZURITA: MARIANA Historia general de Espana, lib. xii.    <sup>1</sup> Annal. Toletan.    <sup>2</sup> P. MORET. ZURITA.

pilgrims, or crosses, as the pope's soldiers were stiled, had absolutely destroyed the town of Beziers; and this too with circumstances of inexpressible cruelty, having massacred all who were in it. The earl of Beziers, who was also viscount of Carcaſſon, retired to the last mentioned city, where the pope's general besieged him: upon which he applied himself for protection to the king of Arragon, his near relation, and to whom he was vassal. The king upon this made a tour into these parts; and as this event is strictly connected with the history of Arragon, and is in itself extremely curious, and highly deserves the reader's attention, we shall hope for his pardon, at least, if we insist upon it a little more particularly; as it will justify several passages in this history which regard religion.

*Discourse
of the count de Beziers at the siege of Carcaſſon
as to the cruelty of
the pope.*

THE king of Arragon intended only to act as a mediator, and understanding that the earl of Beziers exclaimed loudly, that, under the specious pretence of zeal for religion, the pope really meant to strip himself and his uncle, the count of Tholouse, of all their dominions, to extirpate their subjects, and to give them to the count de Montfort, and the crosses, or pilgrims, who were to execute his vengeance, the king desired to discourse with him, which was permitted. At this conference, the earl plainly declared, that he knew this to be the pope's design; because, when he was treating for his subjects of Beziers, he refused to receive his Catholic subjects into his favour; nay, would not so much as spare the priests, who were all cut in pieces in their sacerdotal ornaments, under the banner and the cross: that this example of cruel impiety, joined with what they exercised upon the village of Carcaſſon, where they had exposed all to fire and sword, without any distinction of age or sex, had fully convinced him, that there was no mercy to be looked for from the legate, or his pilgrims; and that accordingly he would choose rather to die, with his subjects defending themselves, than to be exposed to the mercy of an inexorable enemy; such as he had found the legate to be: and though there were, in the city of Carcaſſon, many of his subjects, of a belief contrary to that of the church of Rome, yet that they were persons that had never done any injury to any one; that they had always assisted him in time of need; and that, for this their good service, he was resolved never to abandon them, as they, on their parts, had promised to hazard life and estate in his defence; that he hoped that GOD, who is the reliever of those who are oppressed, would assist them against this multitude of ill-advised men, who, under the pretence of meriting heaven, had quitted their own habitations, to come and burn, pillage, ravage, and murder, in the habitations of others, without either reason, judgment or mercy. Such was this unhappy nobleman's state of the case!

* PIERRE DES VAUX DE CERNAI. Histoire des Albigeois. Theſor des Histoires, An. 1209. N<sup>o</sup>o Hist. de Tholouse, liv. iii. Histoire de Languedoc. ALIX's Remarks upon the Ecclesiastical History of the ancient Churches of the Albigenſes.

Solved

THE king of Arragon returned with this remonstrance to the legate, who assembled a great number of lords and prelates to hear what he had to say; who declared to them, that he had found the earl of Beziers, his ally, extremely scandalized at their inhuman proceedings against his subjects of Beziers, and of the village of Carcasson; and that he was fully persuaded, seeing they had neither spared the Roman Catholics, nor the priests themselves, that it was not a religious war, as was pretended, but a kind of robbery under the colour of religion; that he hoped GOD would be so favourable to him, as to make his innocence, and the just occasion he had to defend himself sufficiently known; that they must not hope now to have them surrender at discretion, since they had found, that there was no other to be expected from them, but that of killing all they met with; that it had never been found good policy to drive an enemy to despair; wherefore, if the legate would be pleased to afford any tolerable composition to the earl of Beziers, and his subjects, that mildness would be a better method to reduce the Albigenses to the church of Rome than extreme severity; and that he ought also to remember, that the earl of Beziers was a young man, and a Roman Catholic, who might be very serviceable in reducing his subjects, who had so great confidence in him, to their obedience to the church. The legate told the king of Arragon, that if he would withdraw a little they would advise what were best to be done. The king being called in again, the legate told him, that, in consideration of his intercession, he would receive the earl of Beziers to mercy; and, therefore, if it seemed good to him, he might come forth, and eleven with him, with his goods and baggage; but that, as for the people that were in the city of Carcasson, they should be delivered to his discretion: of which they ought to have a very good opinion, he being the pope's legate; and that accordingly they should come forth all stark naked, men, women, and children, without shirts, or any other covering on their bodies. Also, that the earl of Beziers should be delivered into sure hands; and that all his estate

The King of Arragon intercedes earnestly with the pope's legate on his behalf.

*Insolence,
barbarity
and perfidy
of the legate, in the taking of Carcas-son.*

estate should be surrendered up to the future lord of his territories, who should be chosen for conservation of the same.

THE king of Arragon having endeavoured to bring the legate to milder terms for the young earl, the legate told him, that these conditions were very favourable. What was worse, the legate employed a person of quality to endeavour to draw the earl of Beziers out of Carcasson, and to bring him to him, with assurance under oath, that he would permit him to return to that city, in case he should not be satisfied with the legate's proposals. The earl, on this assurance, repairs to the legate, and represents to him; that if he would think fit to treat his subjects with more kindness, he would easily induce them to comply with his desire, and recal the Albigenses from their error to the church; that the terms, which had been mentioned to him, were shameful and indecent; that he knew his people would rather die than see themselves reduced to so scandalous an ignominy; and therefore intreated him to come to easier terms, and that he did not question but to make his subjects accept of any other more tolerable conditions. The legate's answer was, that the people of Carcasson might consider what they had to do; that he would concern himself no farther since the earl was his prisoner, and should continue so till the city was taken, and his subjects acknowledged their duty. By which treacherous act, in a great measure, the city was lost, and Don Pedro returned into his kingdom, not at all edified with these papal proceedings; but, at the same time, under a full persuasion of mind, that it was not at all his interest to divulge his real sentiments, for fear of pulling upon himself, and his subjects; that army of merciless barbarians, who had been spreading fire and sword through the finest provinces in France.

*Mischief
that happened in Spain,
through the ill conduct of the court of Rome.*

A. D.
1210.

HE was constrained, the next year, out of regard to his own safety, to publish edicts against heretics; and, in the midst of a victorious expedition against the infidels in Spain, he was called again into France, to the conference at Narbonne: where, though he refused it at first, with the utmost indignation, he was compelled, at length, to grant the investiture of Carcasson to Simon de Montfort, which fully verified the suspicions that had been entertained, that temporal motives were the true springs of all the violent proceedings in this and the foregoing year. He was farther induced, to commit his only son Don Jayme to the care of

“ ZURITA. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. FERRERAS. ” MARCA
Hisp. ZURITA Hist. de Albigeois, cap. xliii. 47.

this

this great lord, Simon de Montfort, upon a promise that he should espouse his daughter, and undertake many other things that were probably against his will, since he was no sooner returned into his Spanish dominions than he consented to the consummation of the match, formerly concluded, between his youngest sister and Don Raymond of Tholouse <sup>x</sup>. The Moors, having made an irruption into the territories of the king of Castile, with a prodigious army, and having besieged Salvatierra, that monarch applied himself to his neighbours of Arragon and Navarre for succours; which Don Pedro would very willingly have given him; and, for that end, wrote to Simon de Montfort to send him the forces that he had left behind him in Provence. But the pope's general thought they might be better employed in cutting the throats of heretics; and so the king forfeited his word, the Moors became masters of Salvatierra, and the monarch of Castile had the mortification of seeing himself unable to keep the field against the infidels, through the ambitious intrigues and anti-christian politics of pope Innocent the third, and his confederates <sup>y</sup>. As soon as he could do it with safety, the king of Castile came to Cuenca, in order to meet the monarchs of Navarre and Arragon, and to concert measures for the next year's campaign. The former sent one of the principal noblemen of his court, the latter repaired thither in person, and both gave the king of Castile the strongest assurances, that they would join him with their forces at Toledo time enough to make an autumn campaign <sup>z</sup>, and to repress the numerous army of the Moors lately arrived from Barbary.

A. D.

1211.

THE miscarriage of the former year made the king Don Pedro extremely solicitous to fulfil his engagements with marches to the utmost punctuality; with which view, he laboured incessantly to draw together a compleat army in the spring; at the head of which he marched himself, accompanied by Don Gracia, bishop of Tarracena, Don Beranger, elect of Barcelona, Don Sancho, count of Roussillon, his son of the same name, Don Garcia Romero, Don Ximenes Coronel, Don Michael Lueffia, Don Aznard Pardo, Don Raymond Fole, Don Guilermo de Cervera, Don Pedro Maza, Don Guilermo de Cardona, the count of Ampurias, and many more of the principal nobility of Arragon and Catalonia; with whom

<sup>x</sup> Chron. var. Antiq. ZURITA. FERRERAS. <sup>y</sup> RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. RAINALD. <sup>z</sup> P. MORET. LUC. Tudens. Chron. ZURITA.

A. D.
1212.

1213.

Joins the confederates in Provence,
and is killed by the papal troops before Mu-
ret.

he arrived at Toledo on Trinity-sunday <sup>a</sup>. He marched from thence with the kings of Castile and Navarre, with the whole power of the Christians in Spain against the *Moor*s; and had his share in that decisive victory obtained over the infidels in the plains of Tolosa: in which, it is said, they lost near two hundred thousand men, and which blow, it is certain, they never could recover <sup>b</sup>. After receiving all the acknowledgements that it was in the power of a grateful monarch to pay, Don Pedro returned, covered with glory, into his own dominions. As he was sensible this event would raise his credit at Rome, he resolved to make use of it, in order to obtain his divorce; for which purpose he sent thither a person much in his confidence. Of which the queen, Donna Maria, was no sooner informed, than she thought it necessary to repair thither in person; not only to solicit this cause, but another which she had against her brethren by the father's side; who, as she insisted, were adulterous bastards: and either her address was so great, or her pretensions so good, that she carried both points <sup>c</sup>.

THE king Don Pedro, irritated at the pope's confirmation of his marriage, and at his directing certain prelates to proceed against him by ecclesiastical censures, in case he refused to live with his wife, as he was required to do by the pope's decree, went into his French dominions. There he found the counts of Tholouse, father and son, who had married his sisters, the counts of Foix and Bearn, and several other great lords in arms against Simon de Montfort; and with these lords he concurred, though, at the same time, he laboured to act as a mediator; and, with much difficulty, procured for them a cessation of arms <sup>d</sup>. This however did not last long, and the king perceiving, that negotiations served only to ruin the lords, agreed, from a principle of equity and justice, for as to his religion it is on all hands agreed that he was zealous for the church of Rome, to assist them in recovering their dominions by force; with this view he came at the head of the confederate army before Muret, a place not very strong, and in which there was no great garrison, but of some importance: for which reason, Simon de Montfort made a forced march, with the flower of his troops, and threw himself into the place. The confederates, <sup>a</sup> RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. ZURITA. LUCÆ Tudens. Chron. <sup>b</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. ZURITA. MARIANA. FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. ZURITA. MARIANA Historia general de Espana, lib. xii. <sup>d</sup> Histoire de Languedoc.

who,

who, in all probability, were not thoroughly acquainted with his strength, continued the siege; upon which, having made all the preparations necessary, he sallied with his whole force, defeated, and obliged them to retire. In this action, which happened on the twelfth of September 1213, Don Pedro of Arragon was slain, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and in the seventeenth year of his reign *. The pope's general, Simon de Montfort suffered his subjects to search for and remove his body, that it might be, as it was, interred with his ancestors. His death was a great blow to the Christian interest in Spain, much greater to his subjects, who were left in confusion, but greatest of all to the confederates, who were, in a manner, undone by this fatal event †.

THE news of the king's death no sooner reached Arragon and Catalonia, than it excited great stirs and tumults. Don Sancho, count of Roussillon, the king's uncle, endeavoured to form a party; Don Ferdinand, abbot of Montarragon, was not so entirely taken up with the thoughts of another world, but that he would have condescended to act the part of a king in this. However, the nobility in general, and particularly Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra, lord of Albaracin, the prelates and magistrates of all the great towns were well affected to the right heir; and dispatched immediately the bishop of Segorba to Rome, to solicit the pope to send express orders to Simon de Montfort, to set their sovereign at liberty, that his faithful subjects might place him on the throne ‡. His mother, the queen Donna Maria, who was also there at this time, joined her solicitations to those of this prelate; so that, at length, such an order was obtained; but being transmitted to the cardinal legate in Arragon, he was to go with it to Montpelier, where, not without some difficulty, Simon de Montfort was engaged to comply with it: So that it was the month of May before the young king was put into the legate's hands: at which time, as his own memoirs say, he was six years and four months old. He was conducted, without loss of time, to Lerida, where the states were assembled, his title acknowledged, and the administration put into the hands of a council of regency, with the infant Don Sancho at their head §.

Confusions excited in Arragon, by the king's sudden and unexpected death.

A. D.
1214.

* ZURITA Hist. de Languedoc, tom. iii. cap. xxii. MARIANA. FERRERAS. † RAINALD. HIERONYMI BLANCHÆ. ZURITA. FERRERAS. ‡ HIERONYMI BLANCHÆ. ZURITA. ABARCA. § RAINALD. Hist. des Albigeois. † Chron. var. antiq.

Don
Jayme
proclaimed, acknowledged and sworn to
by the nobility of Arragon.

A. D.
1216.

THE calm that succeeded this declaration did not continue long. The infant Don Sancho had more power than he deserved, and much less than he desired. Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra perceived this, and very wisely provided for the king's safety, by putting him into the hands of the grand master of the order of knights templars of the noble family of Montaigu; who carried him to the strong castle of Monçon, where he lived with tolerable splendor, and was so happy as to have great care taken of his education <sup>k</sup>. Don Sancho continued his intrigues; of which, as much a child as he was, the king took notice; and, by the advice of the grand master, sent for Don Pedro Fernandez to Monçon, where it was judged the safest method to call an assembly of the states, in the month of September; which was accordingly done: and in that assembly, the king was not only again proclaimed, but the prelates, nobility, and deputies from cities, of their own accord, swore fidelity to him <sup>l</sup>. At first sight, the reader will perhaps judge this a thing of course; it became so afterwards; but, in the present case, it was new and extraordinary. Before this time, the kings of Arragon took a very strict oath, to govern their subjects according to the laws, and to protect them in the full enjoyment of their liberties; but the people did not swear in their turns: so that what they did, upon this occasion, was purely voluntary, and a tacit intimation to Don Sancho to lay aside his sinister practices, and imitate their loyalty. But the example of a whole nation could not teach him his duty; he began, the next year, to raise troops under various pretences; and, as some authors say, attempted to seize his nephew. Of which, the king having given intelligence to the nobility, they suddenly took up arms, and repaired from all quarters to Monçon; from whence, having taken the king out of the fortress, they carried him to Huesca, and from thence to Saragossa; where he was received with the universal acclamations of his subjects, and, notwithstanding his tender age, seated upon the throne <sup>m</sup>, that he might be no longer in the hands, or, in any degree, under the power, of an ambitious uncle; who, by the eagerness he expressed to seize the crown, shewed he was altogether unworthy to wear it.

THE next year there was an assembly of the states held at Tarracona, where the people of Catalonia did homage, and swore fidelity. They did still more: the crown was in debt: those who were about the king complained of the difficulties they were under for want of money; the people of Catalonia readily granted an extraordinary tax for two years. In the month of September, there was another assembly of the states of Arragon and Catalonia at Lerida, where, to purchase public peace, great revenues were given to Don Sancho, who there did homage to the king, and promised to be his faithful subject <sup>a</sup>. In the mean time, there were still great distractions; the nobility falling out with each other, deciding their differences by force of arms, and despising the king's authority, because of his youth; though all writers agree in celebrating the pregnancy of his parts, and relate many extraordinary proofs of them. But as these were mostly shewn in taking a share in these kind of wars, in favour of those who were immediately in his hands, and who perhaps were not always in the right, we shall not insist upon them; the rather, because the king himself, though a perfect child, wrote a letter to pope Honorius complaining of these disorders; and desiring, that he would take his person and kingdom more immediately into his protection: to which that pontiff wrote him a suitable answer, and sent cardinal Bernard his legate into Arragon, to render that young prince what service he was able <sup>o</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. <sup>l</sup> Chron. var. antiq. <sup>m</sup> ZURITA.

A. D.
1218.

*Discords and wars
among his nobility.*

A. D.
1219.

THE year following, the king found himself obliged to expose his person, though but twelve years old, against some of his rebellious subjects. Don Lopez de Alvero had a quarrel with Don Roderic de Cizana: they were both persons of the first rank; but the latter had the most power, and the use he made of it was to seize the person of his adversary, whom he clapped into prison. The relations of Don Lopez finding themselves unable to deliver him, recollected, that there was such a thing as a king in Arragon. Upon their complaint, the council sent an order to Don Roderic to release his prisoner; who treated it with contempt. The young king, piqued at such usage, resolved to make this the first trial of his authority; and, putting himself at the head of a few guards that were about him, marched directly towards the castle of Lizana, though there was nothing more improbable than that he should be able to reduce it. In his progress, however, he was joined by such numbers, that the place was presently invested, and, after a sharp siege, taken, and Don Lopez set at liberty. The governor, who had commanded there, being obliged to take his place, and to remain a prisoner, under the person appointed to command there by the young king <sup>p</sup>. As for Don Roderic, he took shelter under the protection of Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra, who had been always loyal; notwithstanding which, the king besieged his famous fortress of Albaracin; but, after continuing before it for some time, was obliged to desist. It was not long before Don Pedro gave the king such satisfaction, with regard to his conduct, that he was entirely restored to his favour; and perhaps it might be owing to his advice, that the king sent an ambassador to the court of Castile, to demand the infanta Donna Leonora, sister to queen Berengara, in marriage <sup>q</sup>. A very wise and effectual method to establish his authority at home, by securing the support of so powerful a neighbour.

<sup>a</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. Chron. var. Antiq. ZURITA:
<sup>o</sup> RAINALD Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum.

Marriage
between the young king, and Donna
Leonora,
infanta of Castile.
A. D.
1221.

THIS important treaty was quickly concluded, as it was of evident advantage to both nations; and the court of Castile conducted the infanta to Agreda, where the king Don Jayme met them, attended by the principal prelates and peers of his realm. After the ceremony of the espousals were over, the king and the queen went to Tarragona, and afterwards to Saragossa, where they received the nuptial benediction <sup>r</sup>. As this marriage was celebrated on the seventh of February, Ferreras concludes, that the king was just then entered into his fourteenth year; for, if he had been unfit for the marriage state, he thinks the marriage would have been delayed for a time <sup>s</sup>. But the king's own account of the matter puts it out of dispute; he says, that he was but little more than thirteen; and that he did not consummate the marriage till a year afterwards: which is the reason we make this prince a year younger <sup>t</sup> than Ferreras. There had been a very strict friendship subsisting between Don Nuno Sanchez (the son of Don Sanchez, the king's uncle) and William de Moncada, viscount of Bearn; but, as it sometimes happens, among persons of great rank, upon a sudden quarrel, they became inveterate enemies, took up arms against each other, and put the whole kingdom into a flame. On the first news of this disorder, the king assembled a body of troops, commanded the two lords to dismiss theirs on pain of being considered as public enemies; and Don Nuno Sanchez, not paying the respect that was due to his sovereign's orders, took several of his castles <sup>u</sup>. This year died

<sup>p</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. <sup>q</sup> RODERIC TOLLE-
TAN. de rebus Hispan. ZURITA. <sup>r</sup> Chron. gen. Chron.
Pinnat. <sup>s</sup> Historia de Espana, sec. xiii. <sup>t</sup> Chron. Reg.
Jac. <sup>u</sup> ZURITA.

Donna Constantia, the king's sister, and the wife of the emperor †. The infant Don Ferdinand, abbot of Montaragon, who had been long desirous of gaining the supreme administration, at least, during the king's youth, under colour of negotiating an agreement between the two lords before-mentioned, gained them both over to his party; into which he likewise brought Don Pedro Abones, one of the most powerful and best allied lords in Arragon. Having communicated to them his project, they seized upon the persons of the king and queen; and, under colour of taking them out of bad hands, and being more diligent than others in their duty, kept them in reality close prisoners, and possessed themselves of the government *; which they managed as all factions do, in such a manner as might turn most to their advantage.

The king and queen are seized by some seditions nobles, headed by the king's uncle Don Ferdinand, abbot of Montaragon.

THE king bore this usage very impatiently in his own mind, though his uncle behaved towards him with respect; and though the lords, his confederates, endeavoured to atone for their want of obedience, by a ceremonious submission; which could not impose upon him, though it did upon the vulgar. For, with all these exterior marks of reverence, every one, in his turn, had his demand to make; or, in plain terms, his private interest to serve, at the expence of the crown, and of the public ‡. The king, seeing little hopes of deliverance, dissembled, with a very good grace, for more than a year; till hearing the people grumble, that, contrary to the treaties formerly made with Castile§, that crown had received homage from Abuzite, king of Valencia, he resolved to lay hold of that circumstance, in order to recover his freedom. As soon as he had formed this project, he proposed to the lords, in whose hands he was, to go to Tortosa; to which, foreseeing no danger, they gave their consent. From thence he made his escape to Tervel, and summoned thither the nobility to attend him in an expedition against the Moors <sup>²</sup>. As this was a very popular thing, he had soon a body of troops about him, with which he invested Peniscola; where it quickly appeared, that, though he had cropped the leaves, the roots of faction still remained; for several of the lords retiring with their troops without his leave, the king found himself under the necessity of raising the siege. Abuzite laid hold of this opportunity, and, offering to become his vassal, concluded a peace <sup>³</sup>; by which, in some measure, the honour of the crown was vindicated, and the end of the war answered.

A. D. 1223.

The king makes his escape, and invests Peniscola.

† ALBERT. de Staden.    * Chron. gen. ZURITA, ABARCA.    ‡ Chron. gen.    <sup>²</sup> ZURITA.    § ABARCA. Chron. gen.

As the king returned from this expedition, he met Don Pedro de Ahones, with a very compleat corps under his command, marching into the field. Upon this, he signified to Don Pedro, that the peace was concluded, and that he should forbear hostilities; which he was so far from regarding, that he wasted the country, in a manner not at all suitable to the laws of war. The king, thereupon, sent Don Sancho de Luna, with a body of troops to restrain him, who finding that was only to be done by force, engaged, beat and killed him <sup>b</sup>. The king expressed great concern for this, and immediately sent Don Pedro's body to his relations. But his uncle Don Ferdinand applying himself to the passions of that family, and having recourse to those intrigues, which for many years had been his study, soon raised insurrections in almost all parts of the kingdom <sup>c</sup>. The king, understanding that Don Sancho Ahones, bishop of Saragossa, and brother to Don Pedro, was assembling a great body of troops, in hopes of making himself master of the capital, he sent Don Blasco de Alagon, and Don Artel de Luna, with what forces he could spare, to oppose him; and they behaved so well, that he was totally routed <sup>d</sup>. The king marching against his uncle, thought he might prevent the city of Huesca from revolting, by an act of confidence and complaisance in going thither in person; but he had like to have paid very dear for this experiment, the populace taking up arms while he was in the town; so that with the few people about him he was forced to fight his way out <sup>e</sup>. After this, having assembled such of the nobility as remained faithful, with a body of troops sufficient to defend his person, he declined prosecuting the war, in order to try what could be done by the softer method of negotiation.

A. D.
1225.

Insurrections in different parts of the kingdom.

The king by his mildness and moderation restores his own power, and his subjects peace.

THE nobility, after a little reflection, perceiving plainly, that it would be a difficult, and, at the same time, a very dishonourable thing, to put the king a second time into prison, without doing which, Don Ferdinand could be of no use to them, thought fit to reconcile themselves, as fast as they could, to their prince; who, instead of reproaching them with their past faults, studied excuses for their misbehaviour, that they might return with greater facility into his favour and presence <sup>f</sup>. The great cities pursued a different conduct, particularly Saragossa, Huesca, and Jacca entering into a kind of league, by which they erected a sort of republic within a monarchy, under pretence of defending each other from the inconveniencies that were the result of the present troubles. But, in a little time, those who by their influence had determined them to this measure, began to assume such authority, and to levy such large sums of money, that the citizens quickly found, that, through the sound of liberty, they had been cheated out of the substance; and, therefore, sent deputies to the king, to desire they might be restored to his protection. This monarch perceiving, that, after all, it would require some time to bring things into perfect order, declared of his own accord, that he was willing the archbishop of Tarracona, the bishop of Lerida, and the grand master of the Temple should hear, determine, and redress, whatever grievances his subjects might sustain; and the reputation of these three persons was so great, that the people unanimously consented to what the king proposed; and thus, after he had worn the title about fourteen years, he became really king, and his own master, when he was something more than twenty 8.

<sup>b</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. <sup>c</sup> A-BARCA. Chron. gen. <sup>d</sup> ZURITA. <sup>e</sup> ABARCA, FER-RERAS. <sup>f</sup> ZURITA.

THE great object of the king's ambition was, the conquest of the Moorish kingdom of Majorca; the inhabitants of that island, by their piracies, rendering the trade of his subjects in Catalonia altogether precarious. He assembled the states of that principality at Barcelona, where, upon the king's proposition, the conquest of that country was resolved upon, the number of troops fixed, and the necessary funds found and settled <sup>h</sup>. While the states were sitting, the countess of Urgel put in her claim to that territory, as daughter and heiress to the deceased count, against Don Gerard Cabrera his nephew, who was in possession of it. The states decided in favour of the countess; and Don Gerard refusing to submit, the king put her into possession by force of arms; after which, he prevailed upon her to marry his cousin, the infant Don Pedro of Portugal <sup>1</sup>. The cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate, being informed that the king and queen were cousins, though in a remote degree, intimated, that their marriage was null. Upon which Donna Berengara, and her son Don Ferdinand of Castile, consented that the validity of this marriage should be inquired into by a council to be held for that purpose at Tarracona; where accordingly it was judged to be invalid, the pope's legate presiding. But the

By management with the pope's legate, the king obtains a divorce from queen Leonora.

A. D.
1229.

<sup>8</sup> ABARCA Chron. gen.      <sup>h</sup> Chron. var. Antiq.      <sup>1</sup> EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, ZURITA.

infant Don Alonso, who was born of this marriage, was to remain unprejudiced by this decision, and to retain his right to the crown <sup>k</sup>. Most writers agree, that this was also a farce, and that the pope's legate acted by the king's instructions; however, she and her sons were sent back into Castile <sup>l</sup>, and the king took the necessary measures for executing his project against Majorca. We shall not enter here into the particulars of that war, as they fall more properly within the design of the next section; and we shall, therefore, content ourselves with observing, that, by the close of the year, the capital was taken, the Moorish monarch made prisoner, and the island in a manner reduced by the Christians, though the Moors made a brave defence.

The conquest of Majorca by the folly of the Moors becomes the means of reducing Valentia.

IN the course of the war of Majorca, the Moors had applied themselves, in the strongest manner, to Abuzite, king of Valentia, for his assistance; but he declared, that the truce subsisting between him and the king of Arragon, put it out of his power to comply with their demands: to which they imputed the loss of their liberty and country. How reasonable, or how just soever his conduct might be, it drew upon him great suspicions, insomuch, that many of his subjects began to suspect he was in his heart a Christian <sup>m</sup>. Zaen, who was governor of Denia, artfully heightened this spirit of disaffection, till it gave him an opportunity of expelling his master and his son out of the city, and the best part of the kingdom of Valentia; upon which, they demanded, and obtained the protection of the king of Arragon with a suitable subsistence; and, besides Segarba and some other places remaining firm in their duty, Abuzite continued the sovereign of part of his dominions, notwithstanding the capital and the rest of them were in the hands of Zaen. This division suggested the hopes, at the same time that it furnished the king of Arragon with the means, of making himself master of the whole <sup>n</sup>; which he had ever in his view.

A. D.
1330.

King Sancho of Navarre, out of pure regard to his merit, adopts the king of Arragon.

AT this time, his reputation was so high in Spain, and he was held to be a prince who had the good of his subjects so much at heart, that the old king, Don Sancho of Navarre, desired to have an interview with him at Tudela; to which the monarch of Arragon readily consented. The motive, on the part of Don Sancho, was very extraordinary;

* RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LVC. TUDENS. Chron. Card. d'AGUIRRE CONC. Hispan. <sup>l</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>m</sup> FRANC. DIAGO ANNALES del Reynode Valencia, Chron. Jac. Reg, <sup>n</sup> ZURITA, DIAGO, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

he was offended with his nephew, Thibault, count of Champagne, who had raised some stirs in his dominions; and therefore he adopted Don Jayme, and obliged his nobility, and even his nephew himself, to do him homage, and acknowledge him as his successor<sup>o</sup>. The countess of Urgel, dying without heirs, bequeathed her territories to the infant Don Pedro of Portugal, her husband; but the king, being desirous of uniting that county to the principality of Catalonia, gave his cousin the lordship of the isles of Majorca, with which he was perfectly satisfied<sup>p</sup>. This donation engaged the king to make another expedition for the reduction of Minorca; and having, upon this occasion, called an assembly of the states, he declared, in case any accident befel him, the kingdom belonged of right to the infant Don Alonso, who lived with his mother in Castile; but provided, in case of his accession, that he should bring no foreign troops, and reside in the castle of Monçon, leaving the administration to a council of regency<sup>q</sup>; which sufficiently destroys Mariana's notion, that, in the interview at Tudela, there was a reciprocal adoption, which, on the part of the king of Arragon, would have been very unnatural and unjust; and, from the circumstances before-mentioned, it appears to have been false in fact<sup>r</sup>. This expedition having ended as gloriously as he could wish, the king returned, covered with reputation, into Catalonia<sup>s</sup>.

He called, soon after, an assembly of the states at Monçon, Don Jayme, where he opened to them his new project for the entire conquest of the kingdom of Valentia. To facilitate this, an application was made to pope Gregory the ninth, for a bull of croifade; which was accorded to him without any difficulty, and, upon the publication of it, the king found himself in a condition to prosecute the war with vigour; which he did for several years<sup>t</sup>. The pope, in return for his bull of croifade, procured a council to be held at Ter-racona, in which some canons were made that deserve notice, even in an Universal History. In this council, the reading of the holy scriptures, even of the Old or New Testament, in the vulgar tongue, is severely interdicted; it is forbidden to allow heretics to be present at divine service ; and, by the seventh canon of this council, the holy office or inquisition was established in Arragon <sup>u</sup>. The death of Don Sancho, king of Navarre, might have occasioned great disturbances, if this monarch had not been a hero in the severest sense of the word. The lords of that kingdom, after mature deliberation, concluded, that it would be most for the interest of the people of Navarre, to suffer the natural right of succession to take place, and consequently to raise Don Thibault to the throne. But, as his and their oaths stood in the way, it was necessary to ask the consent of the king of Arragon ; who, with a magnanimity very unusual, and which it would be impossible to heighten by any praise, very readily bestowed it : by which the peace of both kingdoms was preserved, and the common interest of the Christians in Spain much strengthened <sup>w</sup>. He continued all this time his incursions into Valentia, augmented his dominions every campaign, and brought that sinking state nearer and nearer to its dissolution ; in which he was chearfully assisted by the nobility in his French, as well as his Spanish dominions <sup>x</sup>, partly out of a zeal for religion, partly from a spirit of enterprize, and partly also with a view to their own interests.

<sup>o</sup> P. MORET. ZURITA. ABARCA. <sup>p</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. Reg. Gestarum. <sup>q</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. ZURITA. <sup>r</sup> Historia general de España, lib. xii. FERRERAS Historia de España, sec. xiii. <sup>s</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. <sup>t</sup> RAINALD. GASPAR ESCOLANO Historia de la Ciudad y Reyno de Valencia. Fol. en Valencia, 2 vol. 1610, 1611. Vicyana Historia de la Ciudad y de sec. Reyno. Fol. en Valencia 1564. DIAGO. ZURITA.

By the interposition of the pope the king espouses Donna Yolande, or Violante, of Hungary.

THE pope, at that time, Gregory the ninth, desirous to attach so active and fortunate a monarch, in the strongest manner possible, to himself, and to the holy see, proposed to the king of Arragon, a marriage with Donna Yolande, or, as some stile her, Donna Violante, the daughter of Andrew, king of Hungary : which offer the king entertained, and the match was speedily concluded <sup>y</sup>. In the mean time, a dispute had broke out between him and his cousin Don Nuno, count of Roussillon ; but the king readily submitting it to reference, Don Nuno acquiesced, and attended him in his expedition into Yvica, which island when they had conquered, the king returned, and landed his forces in the territories of Valentia ; but, upon the news of the queen's arrival at Barcelona, he set out immediately for that city, where their nuptials were celebrated on the eighth of September <sup>z</sup>. The next year the king was in the field, and reduced several places of consequence ; but perceiving that the war might be much shortened, if, with a little more expence, the army was rendered capable of attacking the city of Valentia; and, having summoned an assembly of the states at Monçon, he made them so sensible of this, that they granted him the necessary supplies; notwithstanding which, it cost him another year before they were in a condition to execute that design; but, in the mean time, his troops gained a very glorious victory, under the command of Don Bernard de Enteca: in which, according to the credulity or the policy of those times, it was given out, that St. George, who is the patron of Arragon, was present<sup>a</sup>. By this good fortune, the king was able to victual the fortresses which he had built, and to restrain the Moors, by which in effect the city of Valentia was already blockaded.

<sup>u</sup> Card. de AGUIRRE Conc. Hisp. <sup>w</sup> P. MORET. RAINALD. FERRERAS. <sup>x</sup> ZURITA. ABARCA. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. <sup>y</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. reg. Gest. <sup>z</sup> Chron. Barcimon. Chron. Pinnat. ZURITA.

A. D. 1237.

ZAEN, who was the possessor, and stiled himself king of Valentia, perceiving by the great levies the king of Arragon made in the winter, that he meant to besiege his capital in the spring, took all the precautions that prudence could suggest. He sent his favourite Ali Albata to Don Jayme, in order to try, if, by any offers, he might be diverted from his purpose; and, at the same time, he addressed himself for succours to the king of Tunis, asserting, that this was a religious war, prosecuted with a design to drive the Moors out of Spain. In the former negociation he had none, and in the latter but little success. The king of Arragon absolutely refused to listen to any proposals: the monarch of Tunis promised him help, as soon as an army and fleet could be assembled<sup>b</sup>. Don Jayme was in the field in the month of January, and, having a numerous army, invested the city, though at a great distance; by this means he reduced abundance of castles and villages, or forced those by whom they were inhabited to abandon them: and, as they all took shelter in Valentia, it produced a scarcity of provisions sooner than otherwise would have happened<sup>c</sup>. Some, however, of the Arragonian nobility, perceiving that much time was already consumed, without any great progress, were for raising the siege; but the king was altogether inflexible, knowing the distress the Moors were already in, and that it would continually increase. Zaen once marched out with all his troops, as if he intended to fight; but finding the Christian army ranged in order of battle, he retired without attempting any thing. At length, however, the king of Tunis's fleet, containing upwards of twenty sail, appeared in the road; for whose reception the king of Arragon had made such preparations, that though they once debarked the troops they had on board, yet the throwing in any relief was found to be a thing impracticable, and, therefore, after various attempts to little or no purpose, they returned home, and left their ally to the sole resource of the miserable borrowing courage from despair <sup>d</sup>.

The king, to put an end to the war in Valentia, besieges the capital.

A. D. 1238.

<sup>a</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. DIAGO, ESCOLANO, ZURITA. <sup>b</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. ESCOLANO, DIAGO. <sup>c</sup> ZURITA. ABARCA. MARIANA. FERRERAS.

The city of Valentia surrendered; Zaen and his subjects being allowed to depart.

IN this sad condition, Zaen sent his prime minister to Don Jayme, to know what terms he might expect, if he was disposed to surrender; upon which the king offered him leave to depart, with such of his subjects as would follow him, with whatever they were able to carry; provided this was done in the space of five days; and that he also surrendered such fortresses as were in his hands on the other side of the river Xucar. Zaen very unwillingly submitted to these conditions, and sent the king word, that, provided hostilities were suspended, he would put the place into his hands on the 28th of September. To which the king replied, that, in order to gain a suspension of arms, he must cause the banner of Arragon to be hoisted in the most conspicuous part of the city; which he accordingly did <sup>e</sup>. At the day prefixed, Zaen evacuated the place accordingly, at the head of upwards of fifty thousand men; but to prevent the difficulties that must have ensued, from the precipitate march of such a multitude, the king of Arragon allowed them twenty days more <sup>f</sup>. He was no sooner master of Valentia, than he bestowed liberal rewards, as well upon the strangers as upon those of his own nobility, who had assisted in the siege; and, at the same time, granted so many, and so great privileges to all who were willing to settle there, that it was repeopled with Christians in a very short space of time; in which the pope gave him all the assistance that could be derived from his plenitude of power <sup>g</sup>.

The rest of the kingdom of Valentia conquered, in breach of the truce.

THE next year, his affairs obliged the king to make a tour to Montpelier, where the people had taken up arms against his governor, and, during his absence, his generals, not at all regarding the truce made with Zaen, took several places, and carried on the war as vigorously as before; and what must be looked on as very extraordinary, the Spanish historians pretend, that they received miraculous assistance in these expeditions; which the king of Arragon could not but disapprove, as equally inconsistent with his own authority,

<sup>d</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. ESCOLANO, DIAGO.

<sup>e</sup> Chron. Jac.

Reg. <sup>f</sup> ESCOLANO. DIAGO, ABARCA. FERRERAS.

<sup>g</sup> Chron. Primat. Chron. Barcimon, ESCOLANO.

and with that public faith, which ought to be held sacred by all nations, who pretend to religion or civility<sup>a</sup>. As this war had been chiefly conducted by his uncle Don Ferdinand, he might have thrown the blame of it upon him, and the lords who obeyed his orders; but, during the three next years, he practised the same thing himself: and this, notwithstanding Zaen came to him himself in person, and offered to retire with his subjects into the island of Minorca, if he would suffer them to remain there in peace. But prosperity banishes all sense of shame, and ambition has no bowels. Don Jayme felt his superiority, and resolved to crush the crumbling monarchy of the Moors; and, therefore, sweeping one place after another, he made himself master of the far greater part of Valentia, with less respect to the maxims of justice and honour than he had shewn in the former part of his life, and by the exercise of which he had obtained this greatness<sup>b</sup>. A conduct that would appear the worse in him, if it was less common among princes.

A. D.
1240.

THE humour, with which he was now possessed, of directing all things at his will, induced him to divide his dominions between his two sons: to Don Alonso, whom he had by Donna Leonora of Castile, he gave the kingdom of Arragon<sup>c</sup>; and to Don Pedro, the son of Donna Violante, he gave the principality of Catalonia, which he would have bounded by the river Segro<sup>d</sup>. This disoblged all parties; Don Alonso considered himself as deprived of all that was given to his brother, and the people of Catalonia murmured at the cutting off from them the country between the rivers Cinca and the Segro. To quiet the latter, he added this country to the portion of his younger son. This so much provoked the elder, that, in conjunction with the infant Don Alonso of Castile, and Don Pedro of Arragon, he took up arms against his father, and made himself master of several places in the kingdom of Valentia; but at length, after some acts of severity, unworthy of the king's character, matters were accommodated, and the infant Don Alonso, for a time, restored to his father's favour; who, being freed from the apprehension of a civil war, went on taking or buying one place after another, till Zaen had nothing left in Valentia<sup>e</sup>. But whether he survived these losses, or died of

Don
Jayme resolves to divide his dominions;
by which he disoblges his sons
and his subjects.

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA. DIAGO. ESCOLANO. MARIANA. FERRERAS.
<sup>b</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. ESCOLANO. DIAGO. <sup>c</sup> RODERIC TOLE-TAN. de reb. Hispan. ZURITA. <sup>d</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. FER-RERAS. <sup>e</sup> RODERIC TOLET. de reb. Hispan. ZURITA.
DIAGO. ESCOLANO.

disease, or grief, while he had somewhat to lose, the Spanish authors do not inform us.

Reduces all Valentia under his power, the inhabitants of which soon after this revolt.

IT was then, and not till then, that the king cast his eyes upon the few places that Abuzite had left, who, for his sake, had lost all Valentia; he proposed therefore, which in effect was to command, that this poor prince should accept of an equivalent; and, having assigned him such revenues as he thought proper, seized and garrisoned those places, the inhabitants of which had been faithful to their sovereign thro' all his misfortunes <sup>a</sup>. About this time, the king Don Jayme committed an action, which most writers have represented as the foulest and most execrable crime possible; he caused the tongue of Don Berenger, bishop of Gironne, to be cut out of his head, and then wrote to the pope to banish him out of his dominions. This bishop it seems was the king's confessor, and revealed to the pope, as it is said, what the king told him in confession. For this offence the king was excommunicated, and the pope sent two legates to absolve him publicly, after an open confession, and a severe penance <sup>o</sup>. The king, who, though carried away sometimes by his passions, was certainly a good prince at the bottom, having called an assembly of the states at Huesca, declared to them the many inconveniencies the people sustained by the prevailing of different customs, having the force of laws, in the different parts of his dominions; he, therefore, advised them to examine these customs, to reconcile them as well as they could, and to form a body of laws that might be obeyed generally, and understood by every body <sup>p</sup>. The Moors in Valentia, either from a strong appetite to liberty, or through the ill usage they met with since they became subjects to the Christians, grew exceedingly discontented; and, at the instigation of one Alafdrach, took up arms, seized several places, fortified them, and seemed disposed for a general revolt <sup>q</sup>.

Makes a new distribution of his territories, which is no better liked than the former.

THE king, who was then at Calatayud, went immediately into Valentia, and took the necessary measures for suppressing this rebellion; the seeds of which, however, he found to be sown so deep, and scattered so far, that, by the advice of some of the ablest heads amongst his nobility, he came to a settled resolution, of obliging the Moors in general to quit that kingdom. About the same time that he published an edict for carrying this project into execution,

<sup>a</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. Reg. gest. DIAGO. ESCOLANO.
<sup>o</sup> RAINALD. MARIANA. Historia general de Espana, lib. xii.
 FERRERAS Historia de Espana, sec. xiii. <sup>p</sup> ZURITA. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. ABARCA. <sup>q</sup> DIAGO. ESCOLANO.

he made also, with great solemnity, his testament, by which he left the kingdom of Arragon only to the infant Don Alonso, gave the counties of Barcelona and Ribagorça, with the islands, to Don Pedro his eldest son by the queen Violante; the kingdom of Valentia to his second son Don Jayme; and his dominions in France to Don Ferdinand his youngest son by that queen. By taking these strong and strange steps he found himself embarrassed, on all sides, to the last degree; for the infant Don Alonso was on the point of taking up arms again, in conjunction with the infant Don Pedro of Portugal, who was no less injured; but, by the persuasion of the infant Don Alonso of Castile, they were prevailed upon to accompany him to the siege of Seville, on his promise to interpose with the king Don Jayme *. On the other hand, the Moors offered the king large sums of money to revoke his edict; but finding him inexorable they took up arms, which threw the whole kingdom of Valentia into confusion *. However, being well supported by his nobility, Don Jayme executed his design by force, and compelled them to retire out of his territories, carrying with them their effects. Upon which they retired into Murcia, Granada, and some thousands transported themselves into Africa *. By the marriage of his daughter Donna Violante with the infant Don Alonso of Castile, he procured to himself great advantages, and put it out of the power of the princes, whom he had disobliged, to disturb the tranquility of his dominions; which otherwise they had certainly done: and, in case of a civil war, the king, in all probability, must have been greatly distressed *.

THE desire the king had of leaving his dominions and his family in peace, engaged him to offer the princes he had disobliged to leave all points in dispute between them to arbitrators, well chose [by the states. The states were pleased with this moderation in the king, whose policy it was, in all critical conjunctures, to advise with his people, and to attach them to their duty by following their advice; in which he never succeeded better than on this occasion; for the arbitrators being chosen, the states by their deputies required the consent of the princes, who, seeing their hopes

The king pacifies the peoples murmurs by referring all grievances to the states.

* ZURITA. ABARCA. DIAGO. ESCOLANO. FERRERAS. MAYERNE TURQUET. * DIAGO. ESCOLANO. ZURITA. * HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. ABARCA. DIAGO. ESCALONO. MARIANA. FERRERAS. * RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. Luc. Tudens. Chron. Chron. del Rey Don Alonso el Sabio.

gone,

gone, if they differed with that assembly, were constrained to acquiesce. The commissioners met at a place called A-riza, and, after several conferences, determined, that the infant Don Alonso should have the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia, and the infant Don Pedro the whole country of Catalonia <sup>w</sup>. The next year, the infant Don Alonso returned into his father's dominions, and was well received; the decision of the commissioners was ratified by the states, and some good laws made in their assembly at Barcelona <sup>x</sup>. In the month of October, the queen Donna Violante departed this life; and the king, as most historians say, espoused Donna Theresa Vidaura his mistress, by whom he had several natural children <sup>y</sup>. Some writers mention certain high disputes, and even acts of hostility, between the king of Arragon and Don Alonso the wife of Castile; but the authors of those times say nothing of it, neither can we find any just or probable reasons assigned. That there were some murmurs in Arragon is more certain, and that the clergy particularly complained their privileges were not sufficiently respected; but the king Don Jayme called an assembly of the states at Lerida, in which he confirmed the liberties of his lay subjects as well as of the clergy; declared, he never had any intention to violate them; exhorted them to pay obedience to the laws, and not to oppress each other, and then endeavour to throw the blame upon him <sup>z</sup>. By this reasonable step he opened the eyes of the common sort, who began to perceive the king's name was often abused.

By the death of Don Alonso, the infant Don Pedro becomes heir apparent, and adopts his brother's notions.

THE same conciliating disposition, which induced the king to compromise all points in dispute with the princes his neighbours, with his children, his prelates, and his subjects, led him to aim at terminating those differences and perplexed pretensions, which the crowns of France and Arragon had upon each other; and after a negotiation, which lasted near three years, he brought this point to bear, and finally adjusted every thing by one solemn and specific treaty. In this, the then king of France, St. Lewis, renounced, on his side, all rights on the counties of Barcelona, Gironne, Urgel, Ampurias, Cerdagna and Roussillon. On the other side, the king of Arragon renounced all his claims on the counties of Carcasson, Rodez, Beziers, Albi, Foix, Cahors, Narbonne, Nimes, and several other places. He likewise quitted all his preten-sions to Provence to queen Margaret of France, daughter to count Raymond Berenger. At the same time it was agreed, that prince Philip, the French king's son, should espouse Donna Izabella, the daughter of the king of Arragon, as soon as he was of age<sup>a</sup>. Some fresh disputes arising between the infant Don Alonso of Arragon, and the king his father, the former, who had a little before married Donna Constantia, daughter to Don Gaston de Moncado, count of Bearn, died suddenly, which gave a new face to affairs in this kingdom<sup>b</sup>. Don Jayme, who now considered Don Pedro as the heir of his kingdom, concluded a marriage between him and Donna Constantia, daughter to Mainfroi, prince of Tarento, who likewise claimed the title of king of Sicily, with whom he had the sum of fifty thousand ounces of gold<sup>c</sup>. It is very remarkable, that on the fifteenth of October this year, upon a suspicion had still of an intention to give his brother Don Jayme the kingdom of Valentia, the infant Don Pedro made privately, but with all the legal ceremonies, a protest, that in case he was brought to give any consent thereto in writing or on oath, it was by force, and against his will; and consequently null and void, and ought to be so reputed: so suddenly had this prince changed his maxims, upon his becoming heir apparent to the crown of Arragon<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>x</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. reg. gest. Chron.

Jac. Reg. <sup>z</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS. Chron. var. Antiq.

A. D.
1260.

THE king took all imaginable pains to render his son's marriage acceptable to the pope, and to engage him to be reconciled to the prince of Tarento, but it was all in vain; at length, the pope dying, the king proceeded in the match, and Don Pedro espoused Donna Constantia at Montpellier, about the same time that prince Philip married Donna Izabella at Clermont<sup>e</sup>. The next year, the king being in the city of Valentia, received a splendid embassy from the sultan of Egypt, whom he entertained with great kindness and magnificence, and at their departure sent with them two lords, from his own court, to compliment the sultan in his name<sup>f</sup>. Upon certain intelligence, that Aben Joseph, king of Fez and Morocco, intended to invade Spain with a great army, the king caused Valentia to be fortified, and, in virtue of his alliance with the king of Castile, to invade Murcia, as thinking it infinitely more expedient to transfer the war into the enemy's country, than to suffer the Moors to enter his own. To procure the supplies necessary for putting his pro-

Conquers
the kingdom of Murcia as the ally,
and on the behalf of Don Alonso king
of Castile.
A. D.
1262.

<sup>a</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. P. DANIEL Histoire de France. <sup>b</sup> ZU-RITA. ABARCA. FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. <sup>d</sup> ZU-RITA, FERRERAS. <sup>e</sup> RAINALD. Chron. Jac.
Reg. <sup>f</sup> DIAGO. Chron. Jac. Reg. FERRERAS.

ject into execution, he assembled the states of Catalonia at Barcelona, and obtained what he demanded, though with great difficulty <sup>g</sup>. He went from thence to Saragossa, where the states of Arragon peremptorily refused to grant any money; upon which, some of the nobility gave him very considerable sums. The king, before the assembly rose, had recourse to his old method; he desired, that the states would name some of their own body, to consider the proposition he had made, and offered to be bound by their report. They named, accordingly, the bishops of Saragossa and Huesca, who immediately declared, that the king's demand was reasonable, and for the welfare of the state; upon which the supply was readily granted, and chearfully paid <sup>h</sup>. The next year, the king made an irruption into Murcia, where he took a great many places; and the year following made himself master of the capital: after which he delivered both with great honour to the king of Castile, pursuant to the treaty between the two crowns; in consequence of which, he made this war only as the ally of Don Alonso the wise <sup>i</sup>. By this punctuality he added greatly to his reputation, and yet by putting the Castilians between him and the Moors he consulted his own interest.

Don
Jayme
obscures
his glory
by an obstinate adherence to his vices
of the grossest
kind.

THIS monarch, so prudent and so great in his public character, was the very reverse in his private life. He had entered into an amour with a lady who was related to him; and, being inclined to marry her, applied to the pope for a divorce from his third wife Donna Theresa, upon pretence that she had a contagious leprosy. But the pontiff, being well informed of the true cause, wrote him a letter, in which he not only refused his request, but exhorted him, in very strong terms, to alter a course of life so injurious to his dignity, and so unfuitable to his years <sup>k</sup>. As this had not the desired effect, the pope wrote to him the year following, assuring him, that if he continued the scandalous conversation he would excommunicate both him and his mistress Donna Berengara, daughter to the infant Don Alonso de Molina, and cousin to the king of Castile <sup>l</sup>. It will appear probable, from the current of the history, that this epistle did make some impression upon the king's mind, since he took the cross, and resolved to go with a choice corps of his own troops into the Holy Land. His son, the infant Don Sancho, being elected, by the favour of the king of Castile, archbishop of Toledo, his father, at the earnest invitation of the king and queen of Castile, as well as of his son, made a journey to hear the archbishop sing his first mass, upon Christmas-day, in his church of Toledo <sup>m</sup>, when the principal nobility of both kingdoms were present, and the whole conducted with the utmost pomp and splendour.

<sup>g</sup> ZURITA Chron. Jac. Reg. <sup>h</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon. Reg. gest. Chron. Jac. Reg. MARIANA. <sup>i</sup> Chron. del Rey Don Alonso el Sabio. Chron. Jac. Reg. FERRERAS. <sup>k</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA. <sup>l</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

A. D.
1268.

THE king having conferred often with his son-in-law Don Alonso, who endeavoured to persuade him to lay aside his cross, and voyage, but without effect, at length quitted the court of Castile, and went to Valentia, where he made the proper dispositions for the security of that kingdom, during his absence; he went next into Arragon, for the same purpose; and, having taken leave of his family, and of his principal ministers, he repaired to Barcelona in the autumn; and, on the fourth of September, embarked, with a fine body of troops, compleatly furnished with all things necessary, on board a squadron of thirty large ships, besides transports; but meeting with a severe storm on the coast of Sicily, they were separated, and the ship, in which the king was embarked, drove into a small port in France, from whence he returned into his own dominions <sup>n</sup>. He was scarce arrived there, before he found himself sollicitated to interpose in composing the disputes that had arisen between his son-in-law Don Alonso the wife, as well with his family as his subjects. The chagrin he felt, for undertaking this without effect, was very much heightened by a quarrel that broke out in his own family, between the infant Don Pedro his eldest son, and a natural son of his, Don Hernando Sanchez; which was carried to such extremities, that the former employed some to assassinate the latter, who, with great difficulty, saved his own life, and that of his wife by flight <sup>o</sup>. Upon the invitation of pope Gregory the ninth, he resorted to the general council held at Lyons, and there had an interview with the pope; where, some say, he took it ill, that the pope refused to crown him in a solemn manner, and others, that he was received there with all the marks of respect possible. However, he returned to Montpellier in the space of three weeks,

A. D.
1269.

<sup>m</sup> Chron. del Rey Don Alonso el Sabio. Chron. Jac. Reg. ZURITA. <sup>n</sup> Chron. del Rey Don Alonso el Sabio. ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>o</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.

A. D. and from thence into Catalonia, where many of the nobility 1274. had taken up arms, his own bastard son Don Hernando Sánchez being at the head of the confederates <sup>p</sup>.

Disturbances in Catalonia, in which Don Her-
 nando Sanchez takes part against his father.

THE king, as the surest way of restoring the public peace, caused an assembly of the states to be held at Lerida, where he explained the sources of this disorder; which were, that upon information that the Moor Alasdrach, who had put himself under the protection of the king of Granada, had, by his intrigues, prompted a great number of his subjects in Valentia to take up arms; he directed the nobility of Catalonia to march thither with their forces, as the only method which in this exigency he could take. Which order they disobeyed, and had entered into a league amongst themselves, to prevent any of them from being punished for their ill conduct <sup>q</sup>. The states did all they could to compose these troubles, but to no purpose; they made, however, a law, to render the monarchy more strictly hereditary, swore fealty of their own accord to Don Alonso, the son of the infant Don Pedro, and desired the pope would give his sanction to this, which they would have considered as a fundamental law of the kingdom <sup>r</sup>. The king, as soon as the states separated, marched in person against the count of Ampurias, and sent his son Don Pedro, with an army, to destroy the seeds of sedition which were springing up in Arragon. He was very well pleased with this commission, pursued it vigorously, and having intelligence, that his brother Don Hernando had thrown himself into the castle of Pomar, he caused it to be invested, and pushed the siege so vigorously, that Don Hernando, attempting to make his escape in disguise, was, by his brother's orders, thrown into the river Ginca, where he miserably perished <sup>s</sup>. Don Pedro, having extinguished the rebellion, made an irruption into the kingdom of Granada, to punish the Moors for killing his brother the infant Don Sancho, archbishop of Toledo; of which we have given a full account in the history of Castile. While the royal infant was thus employed, the king had drawn upon himself another reproof from the pope, by causing the wife of a private person, to whom he had taken a fancy, to be carried away from her husband by force; which, however, served only to provoke him, and to render his vices more odious to his subjects <sup>t</sup>.

A. D.
 1275.

<sup>p</sup> Chron. Jac. Reg. RAINALD, ZURITA. <sup>q</sup> DIAGO, ZURITA. <sup>r</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>s</sup> ZURITA, DIAGO, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>t</sup> RAINALD, FERRERAS.

THE next year, the Moors in Valentia, under the command of Alasdrach, and, by the assistance of the king of Granada, executed the revolt they had so long projected, and seized Montesa, and some other places <sup>A new rebellion of the Moors in Valentia, and the death of the king Don Jayme.</sup>. The king, upon the first notice, having assembled a numerous army, took up his own quarters at Xativa, from whence he detached Don Pedro Fernandez de Hizar, his natural son, with a strong corps of troops, to reduce Beniopa, into which the Moors had put a great garrison, and directed, that two other lords with another body of troops, should prevent the enemy from sending any relief. Don Pedro Fernandez was fortunate enough to execute his design, but the other lords, being drawn into an ambuscade, were totally defeated; Don Garcia de Azagra with the best part of the troops being cut to pieces, and Don Pedro de Moncado, grand master of the Templars, made prisoner with the rest <sup>v</sup>. The news of this defeat being carried to the king at Xativa, struck him to the heart, so that he immediately fell sick. He caused himself, thereupon, to be transported to Alcira, in hopes of growing better by the change of air; but, finding himself worse, he sent for his son Don Pedro, and, recommending his brother in the most passionate terms, resigned the crown, and, having taken the habit of a Cistercian monk, and expressed in a most pathetic manner his penitence for the ill example he had given his family and subjects, he expired on the twenty-fifth of July, in the year one thousand two hundred seventy-six, in the sixty-third year of his reign, and in the sixty-ninth of his life <sup>x</sup>. He left behind him his successor Don Pedro, his second son Don Jayme, or James, to whom he gave the kingdom of Majorca, and all that he held in France, Donna Violante, queen of Castile, Donna Izabella, queen of France, Donna Constantia, the wife of the infant Don Emanuel of Castile, Donna Sancha, who, it is said, went in a disguise to Jerusalem, and led there a life of devotion, Donna Maria, who died a nun; all these by his second queen Donna Violante. By his third wife Donna Theresa, to whom he was certainly once, if not twice married, Don Jayme, and Don Pedro; and by Donna Berengara Fernandez, a lady of the first quality, Don Pedro Fernandez de Hizar <sup>y</sup>.

THE king Don Pedro the third caused his father's body to be deposited, for the present, in the cathedral of Valentia, <sup>Don Pedro III, entirely</sup>

<sup>u</sup> ZURITA, DIAGO, ESCALONO. <sup>v</sup> ABARCA. Indic. Return ab Arragon, reg. gest. <sup>x</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, <sup>y</sup> ZURITA, MAYERNE TURQUET,

*Subdues the rebels in Valentia,
and composes things in Catalo-
nia,*

A. D.
1277:

and, having made a truce with the Moors, went to Saragosa, where he was crowned with great solemnity, on the twenty-seventh of November, with Donna Constantia his queen; and the states, at the same time, acknowledged in the most solemn manner his eldest son the infant Don Alonso for his successor <sup>a</sup>. He granted protection to Donna Blanca and her sons, the infants de la Cerda; and, having received from the pope permission to tax the clergy for the war with the Moors, he attacked them on all sides, as soon as the truce was expired, and pushed them with such vigour, that they were obliged to shut themselves up in Montesa, notwithstanding that their strength fell little short of thirty thousand men <sup>a</sup>. The king invested and attacked the place with such spirit and success, that by the close of September they were obliged to capitulate; by which he put an end to the troubles of Valentia <sup>b</sup>. The satisfaction he derived from thence was quickly troubled, by the almost total defection of Catalonia, where the nobility took up arms, under pretence that he had not assembled the states of that country, or sworn to preserve their privileges; but, in reality, because they apprehended he meant to extinguish some pernicious customs, that were equally detrimental to the authority of the sovereign, and to the welfare of the greatest part of his subjects <sup>c</sup>. In the spring of the next year, the king assembled the states of Tarragona, where he commanded the prelates and great lords to repair to Valentia, in order to remove his father's corpse to the monastery of Toplet; which ceremony was performed with great pomp and magnificence <sup>d</sup>. He then attacked the confederate lords, and partly by force, partly by treaty, dissolved their alliance, and obliged them to submit <sup>e</sup>.

1278.

*His firmness, address and success in the conduct of his administra-
tion,*

HE managed with great dexterity in the quarrels between the crowns of France and Castile; and though he had an interview with the infant Don Sancho, of which we have a large account in Mariana, yet it does not appear, that he entered deeply into his measures, though he made him large promises <sup>f</sup>. He compelled his brother Don Jayme to do him homage for the kingdom of Majorca, and all the dominions his father had left him, contrary to the intention of that monarch 8. The confederate lords taking up arms again in Catalonia, Don Pedro, though they had assembled a great body of troops, compelled them to quit the field, and to shut themselves up in the castle of Balaguer; where, after a short siege, he obliged them to surrender at discretion, and sent most of them prisoners to different fortresses: by which the peace of his dominions was perfectly restored <sup>b</sup>. He went afterwards to Tholouse, where he had a conference with his brother-in-law king Philip; to whom he explained the motives of his conduct in Catalonia, that, in case of any fresh troubles, the malecontents might be able to obtain no succours from that side <sup>i</sup>. On his return into Arragon from this interview, he received ambassadors from Don Denis king of Portugal, to demand his daughter the infanta Izabella, or Elizabeth, in marriage: to which he readily consented; and that princess was so exemplary in her conduct, that, after her demise, she was considered as a saint <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> ABARCA. Indic. Rerum ab Arragon, reg. gest. FERRERAS. <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, RAINALD, DIAGO. <sup>c</sup> ESCALONO, FERRERAS.

<sup>d</sup> Hieronymi BLANCÆ, ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>e</sup> Indic. Rerum ab Arragon, reg. gest. FERRERAS.

<sup>f</sup> Chron. var. Antiq. <sup>g</sup> Historia general de Espana, lib. xii.

THE reader has been before informed, that this monarch, in right of his wife, had a claim to the crown of Sicily; the nature of which will be explained in the history of that kingdom. The French, who were then masters of that island, oppressed the people to such a degree, that John de Prochira, a noble Sicilian, formed the project of setting them at liberty. He went first to the pope, who, though he approved his project, would run no hazards, Charles of Anjou, who then held Sicily, being very powerful in Italy <sup>l</sup>. Prochira went next to Constantinople, where he represented to the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, that, under pretence of an expedition to the Holy Land, Charles of Anjou was making vast preparations by land and sea, with an intention to dethrone him; adding, that the only way to prevent this blow was to engage Don Pedro of Arragon to assert his right to the kingdom of Sicily. The Greek emperor closed with his proposals, and sent him into Arragon, where he was well received by Don Pedro, who told him, he was not averse to such an expedition, but that it would require an immense sum of money, which he had not <sup>m</sup>. Prochira went back to Constantinople, where he so alarmed the Greek emperor's fears, that he obtained at once the large sum Don Pedro demanded, and which he brought him with great fidelity, and, what was yet more extraordi-

The manner in which he was engaged to vindicate his queen's claim to the crown of Sicily.

<sup>g</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA.

<sup>h</sup> MARIANA, FERRERAS, MA-

YERNE TURQUET.

<sup>i</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ,

FERRERAS.

<sup>k</sup> EMANUEL de Faria y Sousa.

<sup>l</sup> RAINALD.

<sup>m</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.

nary, he managed these several negotiations with so much address, and such profound secrecy, that when the king of Arragon began to assemble his fleet and army, none of his neighbours were able to penetrate his design, and he amused them with such general answers, as did not in the least explain it <sup>n</sup>. When his preparations were in a manner compleat, he very unexpectedly set all the lords at liberty, telling them, that men of noble minds were to be bound by obligations; and that he expected that tranquility from their gratitude, which a prince of another character would have thought better secured by continuing them in confinement <sup>o</sup>.

The king executes with great spirit and success the expedition against the isle of Sicily:

WHILE the king was busy in equipping this great armament, the brother of the king of Tunis, who was lord of the town of Constantine, and a little district about it, sent to implore his protection against his brother, who threatened to strip him of his small seigniory. Don Pedro promised him all, and even more than he desired, looking upon this as the most happy incident possible, since it afforded him a plausible pretence of saying, that he armed against the infidels <sup>p</sup>. At length, having embarked a fine army, on board a fleet of one hundred and fifty sail, he weighed anchor on the sixth of June from the port of Tangos, leaving the infant Don Alonso, and the queen his mother, regents, and steered directly for Minorca <sup>q</sup>. He proceeded from that island to Alcael, a port in Africa, belonging to the lord of Constantine, where he landed his troops, and dispatched ambassadors to the pope to desire his assistance in carrying on the war against the infidels <sup>r</sup>. But affairs had quite changed their face at Rome, where, instead of Nicholas the third, who was an implacable enemy to Charles, king of Sicily, Martin the fourth now occupied the papal throne, who was the creature of that prince, and who, suspecting Don Pedro's design, treated his ambassadors but roughly <sup>s</sup>. In the mean time, the people of Sicily having assured Don Pedro, that they were entirely devoted to his interest, he quitted Africa, and arrived in the month of August at Trapani; from whence he proceeded to Palermo, where he was received with all imaginable joy, and with universal applause proclaimed king of Sicily <sup>t</sup>. He afterwards employed his fleet and army in delivering Messina, which was besieged by king Charles, whose fleet was beaten at sea by the infant Don Jayme of Arragon, which left him the undisturbed possession of the island to which he laid claim <sup>u</sup>. The pope, however, on the behalf of his competitor, launched his spiritual thunder against Don Pedro, and, by a bull dated December the eighteenth, declared him excommunicated <sup>w</sup>. The campaign ended with an agreement between the competitors, to decide their contested titles by a personal combat at Bordeaux, on the first of June, in the ensuing year, to be attended each by one hundred knights <sup>x</sup>. The French historians say, that Don Pedro was the challenger <sup>y</sup>; whereas those of Arragon assert, it was king Charles <sup>z</sup>. But the fact is out of dispute, as also, that the king of England, to whom they were both related, promised them a fair field for terminating their quarrel.

<sup>n</sup> NICOLAS Especial dans de Marca, liv. i. NICEPH. GREGORAS, liv. v. ZURITA, ABARCA. <sup>o</sup> MARIANA, FERRAS. <sup>p</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCHÆ, ABARCA, FERRAS. <sup>q</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. ZURITA. <sup>r</sup> RAINALD, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>s</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA. <sup>t</sup> MALESPINI, Hist. Florent.

A. D.
1282.

THE king Don Pedro employed the next spring in reducing most of the places in the island, in which his competitor had garrisons; and the queen Donna Constantia, and her two sons Don Jayme and Don Frederic being arrived, in pursuance of his orders, he settled the regency in her and the infant Don Jayme with a council; and having detected a conspiracy against his life, and punished such as were concerned in it, he embarked at Trapani for Valentia, where he arrived on the seventeenth of May <sup>a</sup>. It is asserted by the historians of Arragon, that he actually proceeded to Bordeaux, and, early in the morning, on the first of June, presented himself to the seneschal of Edward, king of England, and demanded of him, whether he might be secured of a fair field, as had been promised; but the seneschal told him, that king Philip of France was expected there with his brother; that he had a prodigious number of troops in their neighbourhood; and that he could not answer for his security: upon which the king left his buckler and his lance, as proofs that he had personally appeared, and then withdrew privately and speedily into his dominions <sup>b</sup>. The French historians say the direct contrary, alleging, that Charles, king of Naples and Sicily appeared, traversed the ground appointed for the combat with his knights, and, that the king of Arragon arriving in disguise, came in the evening, and when his competitor was withdrawn, and engaged the seneschal to enter his appearance <sup>c</sup>. It is however certain, that the French soon

Combat
for the crown of that island
at Bourdeaux,
which ends in nothing.

<sup>u</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MALESPINI Hist. Florent. <sup>w</sup> RAINALD.

<sup>x</sup> ZURITA, MALESPINI Hist. Florent. MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>y</sup> MEZERAY Abreg. Chronolog. tom. iii.

<sup>z</sup> ZURITA, Gest. Comit. Barcin. <sup>a</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Flor.

ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, Gest. Comit. Barcin.

<sup>c</sup> MEZERAY Abreg. Chronolog. tom. iii.

A. D.
1283.
Reduces
the fortrefs
and sovereignty of Albarracin, and gives it to his natural son.

after sent troops into Arragon, against whom the king, assisted by Don Sancho of Castile, defended himself without any loss either of territory or credit <sup>d</sup>. In the month of October, he assembled the states of Arragon at Saragossa, in order to pacify some disputes which had arisen with the nobility about their privileges, and soon after received advice, that Roger de Lauria, whom he had left his admiral in Sicily, had gained some advantages over the enemy, and had made himself master of the island of Malta <sup>e</sup>. At this time, Don Juan Nugnez de Lara, in right of marriage, was become possessed of Albarracin, a place of great strength and importance on the frontiers of Arragon and Castile. Thus, by the family of Azagra, had been erected into a kind of sovereignty, which by a strange concurrence of accidents, but particularly by courting the favour of one crown, when that of the other was lost, and keeping up the mutual jealousy of such an acquisition, had been strangely preserved, and, from the precariousness of this tenure, fortified as far as the skill of that age would go. It was now become a terror to both; for Philip the hardy, king of France, being at war with the two crowns of Castile and Arragon, and having Don Juan at his devotion, intended to make use of it as a door into the dominions of Don Sancho and Don Pedro. The former, very sensible of the consequences with which this might be attended, relinquished all his pretensions to the latter, who immediately sent the infant Don Alonso to reduce it. The siege was long and difficult, but it was at last rendered by capitulation; upon which the king gave it to his natural son Don Ferdinand, whom he had by Donna Inez or Agnes Zapata <sup>f</sup>. He intended to have reduced Tudela also this campaign; but finding that too hazardous an enterprize, he desisted, the rather because he was informed, that king Philip intended to attack him, in the ensuing summer, with the whole power of France; for which therefore it was necessary to prepare.

His glorious victories by sea,
great generosity,
and there-
sentment it raises in
the pope.

THE success of the campaign by land in Spain was nothing in comparison of the good fortune of his power by sea, under the command of Roger de Lauria, who with a squadron of forty gallies, cruizing within sight of the port of Naples, brought out Charles the lame, prince of Salerno, son of Charles, king of Naples and Sicily, with his father's whole strength of seventy gallies well armed. The fight was long and obstinate, the issue of it very extraordinary; for the admiral of Arragon not only gained a compleat victory, but took from the enemy one gally more than the number of his whole fleet; and, to compleat his triumph, the prince of Salerno himself<sup>3</sup>. Donna Constantia, queen of Sicily, had a sister Donna Beatrix, whom king Charles had long kept in prison; the queen sent him a message, that if he did not instantly release and restore her sister, she would put his son to death: upon which Donna Beatrix was presently sent into Sicily<sup>4</sup>. But the people of that island, who have never been very famous for humanity, discovering very strong resentments against the prisoners taken in the last fight, Don Pedro was no sooner informed of it, than he gave orders they should all be set at liberty, except prince Charles, whom he directed to be sent into Catalonia, purely to preserve his life<sup>5</sup>. The pope renewed his censures against the king of Arragon, and to enforce them gave away his kingdom, as a fief of the holy see, to Charles de Valois, son to king Philip the hardy; publishing at the same time a croisade against the deposed king of Arragon; by which the same indulgencies were given to those who fought against him, as if they made war against the infidels: and, which is very astonishing, the king of France accepted of this grant, in favour of his son, took the cross, and assembled one of the greatest armies that had ever been seen, in order to go and put him in possession of it<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. Chron. del Rey Don Sancho el Bravo, ZURITA. <sup>e</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. Gest. Comit. Barcin.

<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS.

A. D.
1284.

THIS papal fury, though it excited a foreign war, did not in the least disturb the domestic peace of the king's dominions; for not only his lay subjects, but even the bishops and clergy, treated this affair as it ought to be treated, worshipping God, and behaving with fidelity to the king, notwithstanding the pope's interdict. Don Jayme, king of Majorca, deserted his brother, and joined the king of France; upon which Don Pedro made a quick march into his county of Roussillon, and besieged Perpignan, in which city he was with his wife and children. The place was taken, after a long defence, but Don Jayme escaped; yet the queen and her son were sent prisoners into Arragon<sup>1</sup>. When all his preparations were finished, Philip the hardy attempted to enter Arragon, with an army of eighty thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse; the king Don Pedro seized the passages of the Pyrenees; but as such precautions seldom take effect, king Philip found means to bring down his whole army into Catalonia, where he quickly took Roses and Castillon <sup>m</sup>. Don Pedro, having put a strong garrison into Gironne, under the command of Don Raymond, viscount Cardona, dismissed the greatest part of his troops, and kept the field only with a flying army. Don Raymond answered the king's expectations, and made a very gallant defence; for the siege began on the twenty-eighth of June, and the place was not surrendered till the seventh of September, and then upon very honourable conditions <sup>n</sup>. In the mean time, the king's fleets at sea beat the French over and over, and, with the assistance of a corps of land troops, destroyed all their great magazines at Roses; so that king Philip, after he had made a public entry into Gironne, and placed a strong garrison there, was obliged to return; which, as the king of Arragon foresaw, he made him pay exceeding dear for his passage. So that arriving with the remains of a once formidable army at Perpignan, the king was seized with a distemper which carried him off in a few days <sup>o</sup>. Don Pedro no sooner returned from harrassing the French army, than he presented himself before Gironne, and, on his proposing to the garrison leave to march out, and an assurance of conducting them safe into France, they very wisely surrendered <sup>p</sup>. The king then sent his son Don Alonso with a strong fleet to punish his brother Don Jayme, but before he was well arrived in Majorca, the king fell ill at Villa Franca de Panades, where he departed this life on the tenth of November, one thousand two hundred and eighty-five, in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-sixth of his age <sup>q</sup>. He left the crown of Arragon to Don Alonso <sup>r</sup>, and that of Sicily to his second son Don Jayme <sup>s</sup>. Besides these, he left two younger sons, Don Frederic and Don Pedro, and two daughters, Donna Izabella, queen of Portugal, and Donna Constantia, who espoused Robert, king of Naples; besides a great many natural children, both sons and daughters. He was a very brave and generous prince, and really merited the title of great, which is given him by the Arragonian writers, by his actions, as well as by his fortune <sup>t</sup>. His old enemy pope

The invasion of Arragon by the French their retreat, the king Don Pedro's death.

<sup>3</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. MEZERAY. <sup>4</sup> ZURITA, MALESPINI Hist. Florent. <sup>5</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>6</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA, MEZERAY. <sup>1</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS.

<sup>m</sup> MEZERAY Abreg. Chronolog. tom. iii. <sup>n</sup> ZURITA, Gest. Comit. Barcin. MEZERAY. <sup>o</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS, MEZERAY. <sup>p</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. <sup>q</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>r</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. <sup>s</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. <sup>t</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, Gest. Comit. Barcin.

Martin died a few months before him, and he also survived his competitor Charles of Anjou, king of Naples <sup>u</sup>.

Don Alonso the third succeeded his father, though absent in the expedition against his uncle. He was a prince remarkable for discharging his duty, in all relations, with great punctuality. He was obedient to his father, kind to his brethren, and so liberal in his temper, that he obtained the surname of the munificent <sup>w</sup>. He received the news of his father's death almost as soon as he landed in the island of Majorca; but he took the capital, and reduced the rest of the islands, before he returned to Valentia <sup>x</sup>. His brother Don Jayme caused himself, likewise, to be crowned king of Sicily <sup>y</sup>. Don Alonso, upon his arrival at Valentia, received a message from the principal nobility of Arragon, who, from a league they had contracted among themselves in his father's reign, had assumed the title of the union. The purport of this message was, that they were surprized he had assumed the regal title before his coronation, and swearing to maintain their privileges. The king gave them a soft answer, and hastened his coronation; which solemnity was performed with great magnificence, on Easter-day, in the church of Saragossa <sup>z</sup>. This did not intirely put an end to his disputes with the lords of the union, who pretended he had no right to choose his own ministers or servants, but ought to receive them from the states. The king saw plainly, they were encouraged to this by the perplexed situation in which his father had left his affairs; and, therefore, he would enter into no disputes, which he found was the only way to agree with them <sup>a</sup>.

THERE had been a treaty, in his father's life-time, for a marriage between him and the princess Eleanor, daughter to king Edward the first of England; that monarch, therefore, interposed very kindly in his affairs, and sent over doctor Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, and doctor John Vesey, to propose to him the heads of a treaty, which might make him perfectly easy. He was easily prevailed on to consent, that Charles, prince of Salerno, should be set at liberty, upon condition that his brother remained king of Sicily, and that he should marry the princess Blanch, the daughter of Charles, and that his eldest son Robert should espouse Donna

Don Alonso III. succeeds, and acts with great prudence at his accession.

Resolves to marry the daughter of Edw. I. of England, and receives many favours. A. D. 1286.

<sup>u</sup> RAINALD, MEZERAY. <sup>w</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. <sup>x</sup> DIAGO, ESCALONQ, FERRERAS. <sup>y</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. <sup>z</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>a</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ. Chron. var. Antiq.

Constantia, whom some writers call Violante, the sister of the kings of Arragon and Naples; but this treaty was rejected by the pope, who, affecting to tread in the steps of his predecessor, would not acknowledge Don Alonso's title <sup>b</sup>.

After restoring peace as broad, and the dignity of the crown at home, he dies suddenly.

THE king employed the next year in the entire conquest of the islands of Minorca and Ivica, which, when he had accomplished, he returned into Catalonia, called an assembly of the states, and therein cancelled at once all the exemptions and privileges of the nobility that were injurious to the crown and the people <sup>c</sup>. The year following, he had an interview with king Edward at Conflans, wherein it was agreed, that the prince of Salerno, or, as others stiled him, the king of Naples, should be set at liberty, upon his giving his two sons, Lewis and Robert, and several lords, as hostages for the performance of articles; and of these one was, that he should give his daughter in marriage to Charles de Valois, with his dutchy of Anjou; upon condition, that he should renounce all title to the crown of Arragon: but the pope remained still inflexible. This pope was Nicholas the fourth, who excommunicated Don Alonso, released Charles from his engagements, and crowned him king of Sicily <sup>d</sup>. At length, king Edward prevailed upon all the princes, who were embarked in this quarrel, to send their plenipotentiaries to Perpignan; from whence soon after the congress was removed to Tarascon, where, in the month of February, all things were adjusted; but, in this treaty, the king Don Jayme of Sicily was excluded, to satisfy the pope, who thereupon annulled all that had been done against the king of Arragon, or his father <sup>e</sup>. As soon as this affair was adjusted, Don Alonso sent the viscount of Cardona into Guienne, to receive the princess Eleanor, and caused preparations to be made for his marriage at Barcelona, with that magnificence which was natural to him. But, in the midst of them, he was suddenly taken ill on horseback, and, being carried to his palace, died on the eighteenth of June, one thousand two hundred and ninety-one, when he had reigned almost six years <sup>f</sup>. He was a prince highly esteemed by his neighbours, and beloved by his subjects; and, in all probability, had he lived, would have equalled in reputation any of his predecessors. His temporising had delivered him from the restrictions intended by the union; for a prince, who has surmounted difficulties, is not to be controuled.

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, RAINALD. <sup>c</sup> ABRON, MALESPINI Hist. Flor.

<sup>d</sup> ZURITA, MALESPINI Hist. Flor. RAINALD. <sup>e</sup> MEZERAY, RAINALD, FERRERAS. <sup>f</sup> ZURITA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

THE states of Arragon assembled at Saragossa sent immediately the count of Ampurias to acquaint Don Jayme, king of Sicily, with the death of his brother, and to invite him to come and take possession of the throne. In complying with which invitation, he made such dispatch, that leaving his mother Donna Constantia, and his brother Don Frederic, regents of Sicily, he arrived at Barcelona on the twenty-sixth of August, and was crowned at Saragossa on the sixth of September following, to the great satisfaction of his new subjects &. He thought fit to act upon different principles from those of his brother, who, in consideration of the kingdom of Murcia, yielded to him by solemn treaty, had acknowledged the infant de la Cerda for king of Castile. This monarch, on the contrary, closed with Don Sancho, agreed to marry his daughter Donna Izabella, though but nine years of age, and afterwards consented to accept him for the mediator of the peace with the crowns of France and Naples; for, by the death of the late king the treaty of Tarascon was dissolved <sup>a</sup>. These negotiations lasted during the life of Don Sancho, who had such an influence over the king of Arragon, that he prevailed upon him, for the sake of restoring the peace of Christendom, to renounce his rights to the kingdom of Sicily; which, however, proved of no great consequence; for his mother and his brother Frederic absolutely refused to be bound by this cession, resolving to put themselves upon the fidelity of their subjects, and to trust the Sicilians with the defence of their title to Sicily against all opponents <sup>i</sup>. The king Don Jayme, notwithstanding, on the death of Don Sancho, espoused the daughter of Charles, king of Naples, instead of the infant of Castile; pope Boniface the eighth was graciously pleased to absolve the bishops and clergy of Arragon for the great crimes of worshipping God, and obeying their kings, contrary to the commands of his predecessors, and Charles de Valois once more renounced his rights to the kingdom of Arragon, in favour of a monarch who had all the rights to it already that politicians could devise, viz. descent, his brother's will, and the choice of the states <sup>k</sup>.

Don Jayme II. leaves Sicily, and is crowned king of Arragon at Saragossa.

A. D.
1295.

THE king Don Jayme, though somewhat mutable in his measures, was extremely steady to his interests; and, perceiving the weakness of the government of Castile, renewed his brother's treaty with the infant Don Alonso de la Cerda, <sup>Goes to Rome, and is ca-joled into a war with</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. ZURITA.

Sancho el Bravo, ABARCA.

<sup>i</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florentin.

<sup>k</sup> ZURITA, MEZERAY, RAINALD.

his brother
by pope Boniface
VIII.

acknowledged his title, and assisted him <sup>l</sup>. He likewise equipped a stout fleet, and, having embarked a body of troops on board it, went in person to reduce Alicant, which he performed; and conquered afterwards the best part of the kingdom of Murcia <sup>m</sup>. Pope Boniface studied by all means to gain over the king of Arragon, in hopes of prevailing upon him to engage his brother, or to force him to quit the kingdom of Sicily. Don Jayme, wearied with perpetual sollicitations, made, at length, a voyage to Rome, where the pope redoubled his caresses, gave him the title of standard-bearer of the holy church, and very generously bestowed upon him the islands of Sardinia and Corfica, to be held as fiefs from the see of Rome, whenever he should be able to conquer them <sup>n</sup>. All this was done, in order to persuade him to employ his arms against his brother; but the king went no farther than to send for his mother and sister to Rome, where the latter was married by the pope to Robert, duke of Calabria, and then he returned into his own dominions <sup>o</sup>. After his return, the tears of his wife, the instances of his allies, and the fair promises of the pope, induced him to equip a numerous fleet; with which he sailed first to Naples, where he left his queen Donna Blanca with her father, and then weighed anchor with a full resolution to dethrone his brother. The king Don Frederic, who had also a great naval force, thought it better to meet than to expect the danger; and therefore put to sea with an intent to give him battle. However, on receiving a message from him, that he had better remain in his own dominions, he retired. The king of Arragon then landed his troops in Sicily, took several places, and required by proclamation all his subjects in his brother's service to join him, which most of them did, and amongst the rest the famous Roger de Lauria. King Frederic, however, defended himself with vigour, beat several of his brother's squadrons, and took many of his galleys; upon which Don Jayme sent him word to release his subjects, and to send back his vessels, and he would give him no farther trouble; which, by the advice of his council, he absolutely refused. The king of Arragon retired in great discontent to Naples with the rest of his fleet, exhorted his father-in-law to assemble as great a force as he could in the spring, when he promised to return with a fleet superior to that which had been employed in this year's service <sup>P.</sup> We may discern from hence, how great the naval force of the dominions of Arragon must have been, when so great a loss was so easily and suddenly to be repaired.

<sup>l</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>m</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>n</sup> RAINALD. <sup>o</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, RAINALD.

THE king Don Jayme, who had been forced into this first expedition, being now picqued at the losses he had received, assembled, on his return into Catalonia, a fleet of fifty-five sail, with which he proceeded to Naples; and having joined the squadron of his father-in-law, commanded by Robert, duke of Calabria, and Don Raymond, prince of Taranto, steered directly for Sicily. Don Frederic, whose fleet in the harbour of Messina consisted of forty vessels, boldly weighed anchor, and, notwithstanding their great superiority, engaged the combined fleets. The fight was very obstinate and very bloody, but at length the Sicilians were totally defeated with great loss of ships and men; and it was with great difficulty that king Frederic himself escaped with a few gallees. This success had a surprizing effect on the king of Arragon's disposition, for returning with his victorious fleet to Naples, he sent for his mother, the queen-dowager of Arragon and Sicily, and his family, and, in spite of all the persuasions of the pope's legate, his father-in-law, and his brothers, returned to Barcelma <sup>9</sup>. The next year, he laboured by his ambassadors to persuade Don Frederic to think of peace, but no solicitations could induce him to renew the war, from which he was vehemently dissuaded by the queen his mother upon her death-bed <sup>r</sup>.

Makes another expedition against his brother, and the victorious discontenues the war.

A. D.
1299.

1300.

IN the opinion of politicians the troubles of one kingdom are often the harvests of another. The king of Arragon had embraced the party of Don Alonso de la Cerda, and owned him as king of Castile, for the sake of obtaining the fruitful kingdom of Murcia, a great part of which was actually by conquest, but in virtue of this concession in his hands. To keep this, he was obliged to assist that prince in maintaining his title, and was in hopes, that the king of France, who was nearly related to the infant in blood, would have taken a share in the war, or would at least have contributed towards its expence. But, finding himself wholly mistaken, he was constrained to lay a tax upon salt, which extending to all his subjects in general, created great uneasiness, and induced some of the nobility to think of reviving the union <sup>s</sup>.

Receives the infant de la Cerda, but finds it impracticable to establish him.

<sup>P</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florentin. ZURITA. <sup>9</sup> Gest. Comit. Barcin. ABARCA, MALESPINI Hist. Florentin. <sup>r</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>s</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA.

A. D.
1301.

Upon this, the king called an assembly of the states at Saragossa, in which his conduct was approved, but the nobility disapproved theirs: however, his son Don Jayme was acknowledged presumptive heir to the crown <sup>1</sup>. The discontented lords applied themselves to the queen-regent of Castile, as the malecontents of Castile had entered into a league with the king of Arragon. The king saw the folly of all this, he proposed to the queen a peace, if she would make a cession of what he had already acquired in Murcia, which she rejected perhaps with more spirit than prudence; for this obliged the king to foment the troubles in Castile, whether he would or not <sup>2</sup>. On the return of Don Alonso from the court of France, he gave him good advice, and in plain terms recommended to him compromising things in the best manner he could. The pope, tired out with the war in Sicily, consented, at length, to acknowledge king Frederic; of which that prince gave his brother notice, who was exceedingly well pleased with the news. The king was now very desirous of turning the concession of the islands of Sardinia and Corfica to some account; but his schemes were interrupted by the death of pope Benedict the eleventh, and the long vacancy of the papal see. However, during this interval, the king took the best measures he could to avail himself of this donation <sup>3</sup>.

1302.

1304.

The
knights templars
attacked, but protected by the king of Arragon.

A. D.
1306.

A PEACE with Castile was so necessary, that the king consented to the congress of Campillo, where, as we have shewn in its proper place, it was not concluded much to his advantage. The king sent an ambassador to do homage to pope Clement the fifth, for the islands of Sardinia and Corfica, and the Genoese, who were already in possession of part of these countries, sent an embassy to the king, in hopes of regulating matters amicably. Don Jayme demanded from the pope a bull of concession, which was sent him dated May the twenty-eighth; and several of the Sardinian lords came to pay their respects, offer him their service, and to acknowledge his title <sup>4</sup>. The progress of this affair was stopped, however, by the breaking out of another of a very extraordinary nature, which was the persecution of the knights templars; who, at the request of the pope, were generally arrested, and thrown into prison, and all the large estates they held in the king's dominions were on the point of being confiscated. The kingdom of Navarre was, at this time, in the hands of France; notwithstanding which, a war broke out with the crown of Arragon, occasioned probably by some disturbances on the frontiers: in the prosecution of which Don Jayme was far from being successful, for his troops were twice beaten, and his standard taken. In France, and even in Castile, at the request of the pope, the templars were treated with the most barbarous severity. The king of Arragon was very much pressed to treat them in the same manner, but his constant answer was, We must first be convinced of their guilt, and it will be then time enough to talk of their punishment <sup>1</sup>. At the request of Don Ferdinand, king of Castile, he had an interview with him at the monastery of Huerta; wherein two points were regulated, the first, that they should make war jointly against the Moors, the second, that the infant of Arragon should marry Donna Leonora, the king of Castile's daughter <sup>2</sup>. The business of the knights templars remained still in agitation, and the people in general were so provoked against them, that they were compelled to shut themselves up in the fortresses belonging to their order, to prevent being torn in pieces, which precaution was represented to the king of Arragon as an act of rebellion. He marched, therefore, with a corps of troops against one of these fortresses, and summoned it. The knight, who commanded, surrendered immediately, and told the king the truth, assuring him, that they desired nothing but a fair trial, with which the king was extremely moved; took the whole order into his protection; forbade any to abuse or insult them under the heaviest penalties. At the same time he declared, he was ready to receive any informations against them that were supported by proofs: but declared also, that if the informers failed therein, he would punish them as they deserved; which kept things in his territories quiet <sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>2</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Fernand. RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LUC. Tudens. Chron. ABERCA. <sup>3</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA, MEZERAY. <sup>4</sup> ZURITA, RAINALD, FERRERAS.

ALL things being in readiness for his expedition against the Moors, the king embarked at Valentia on the eighteenth of July, and soon after landed his forces in the neighbourhood of Almaria, which was the object of this expedition. The forces being landed, with the ammunition and military stores, the fleet of Arragon failed to join that of Castile, and to cruize upon the coast of Barbary, to prevent any succours which might enable the enemy to relieve either of the sieges; Don Ferdinand having besieged Algezira, and Don Jayme having invested Almeria on the fifteenth of August <sup>b</sup>. Mohammed Aben Alhamar, king of Granada, was exceedingly piqued at the king of Arragon's invasion, with whom he never had any war or dispute before; and therefore determined to attack him first. With this view, he began his march towards him with a numerous army; of which, as soon as Don Jayme had intelligence, he quitted his camp, leaving a small body of troops there, commanded by his cousin Don Ferdinand, son to the king of Majorca, and gave him battle on the twenty-fourth of the same month; when, after a warm contest, the Moors were defeated, with the loss of six thousand men, and the Moors, who had sallied from Almeria while the engagement lasted, were also repulsed by Don Ferdinand with great loss <sup>c</sup>. This, however, did not hinder the king of Granada from attempting the relief of the place a second time, on the fifteenth of October, when he received another check. Notwithstanding which, the rains coming on, Don Ferdinand of Castile being retired from before Algezira, and the king having intelligence of some troubles breaking out in Catalonia, he thought fit to make a truce with the Moors, upon condition, that they set at liberty all his subjects wherever taken; and having embarked his army returned into his own dominions <sup>d</sup>. On the twelfth of November, in the succeeding year, died his queen Donna Blanca, exceedingly regretted by his subjects for her many virtues and amiable qualities. At an interview with Don Ferdinand of Castile, it was determined to persist in carrying on the war jointly against the Moors; and besides the alliance before contracted, it was agreed, that Don Pedro, the king of Castile's brother, should marry the infant Donna Maria, daughter to Don Jayme; but, with respect to the war, as the pope refused to grant the usual succours, and as the troubles in Castile hindered the king from taking the field, the king of Arragon, who had still the conquest of Sardinia and Corfica in his own mind, remained quiet in his own dominions <sup>e</sup>.

He makes war, in conjunction with the monarch of Castile, against the Moors.

<sup>1</sup> PTOLEMÆI LUC. Annales, Vita Clement. V. apud Baluz. P. MORET, MEZERAY, ZURITA. <sup>2</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Fernand. <sup>3</sup> PTOLEMÆI LUC. Annales, Vita Clem. V. apud Baluz. ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

A. D.
1309.

1311.

Treats the knights
templars,

THE hard measure the templars met with in other kingdoms, did not pass for any rule with Don Jayme, who caused <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hisp. Luc. Tudens. Chron. MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Fernand, ZURITA. <sup>d</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, Cronica del Rey Don Fernand. <sup>e</sup> RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. Luc. Tudens. Chron. ZURITA Cronica del Rey Don Fernand.

their

their conduct to be examined in a council held at Tarrago-on the dis- na; in which those who were convicted of any crimes were <sup>solution of</sup> punished as they deserved, and the possession of their estates <sup>that order</sup> secured to the innocent during their lives: after which, as <sup>with equi-</sup>
the order was to be suppressed, by the common consent of <sup>ty and in-</sup> Christian princes, their revenues were assigned to the other <sup>dulgence.</sup> military orders <sup>f</sup>. The king's daughter Donna Izabella espoused Frederic, duke of Austria, and though much sollicited by his other son-in-law the infant Don Pedro of Castile, Don Jayme meddled very little with the troubles in that country <sup>g</sup>. The year following, the pope interposed in behalf of Robert, king of Naples, to prevail upon the king to desist, or rather to oblige the Catalans his subjects to desist from their expeditions into Greece, which, as they were not made at the command, or for the advantage, of the king of Arragon, and as they are mentioned with more propriety in another place, we shall not insist upon here.

BUT while they were disturbing the peace of others, their <sup>Secures the</sup> own trade, and that of the kingdom of Valentia, was ren- <sup>commerce</sup> dered precarious, indeed almost impracticable, by the py- <sup>of his sub-</sup> racies of the Tunizeens <sup>h</sup>. The king, therefore, to put an <sup>jects a-</sup> end to this evil, caused a strong squadron to be equipped, <sup>gainst the</sup> under the command of William de Moncada, who had orders <sup>depredati-</sup> to make the infidels feel, in a very sensible manner, the <sup>ons of the</sup> weight of his master's displeasure. Accordingly, he debarked <sup>Tuni-</sup> his troops, and made himself master of several fortresses along <sup>zeens,</sup> the coast, wasting the country in so cruel a manner, that, in order to be delivered from him, the king of Tunis offered to pay an annal tribute of five thousand doubloons, which the king of Arragon accepted; but it was upon condition, that the fortresses he had taken should remain in his hands for the payment of that tribute <sup>i</sup>. The very same year, the <sup>A. D.</sup> king married Donna Maria, daughter to Henry, king of *Cy-<sup>1314</sup>
<sup>prus</sup>, and, on occasion of this match, he sent an embassy to the sultan of Babylon, to desire his permission to ransom such Arragonians and Catalans as were prisoners within the extent of his dominions. His younger son Don Alonso, marrying Donna Theresa, heiress of Urgel, acquired the possession of that country, which, when he came to succeed his father, was annexed to the crown, from which it was again disjoined <sup>k</sup>.*

<sup>f</sup> PTOLEMÆI LUC. Annales, Vita Clement. V. apud Baluz.
<sup>g</sup> ZURITA. <sup>h</sup> RAINALD, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>i</sup> ZU-RITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>k</sup> HI-ERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, FERRERAS.

His prudent and moderate views, in favour of his people and his family.

As the affairs of this monarch were now in a very happy condition, he turned his thoughts entirely to the improvement of his dominions, providing for the welfare of his subjects, and giving what assistance was in his power to his allies. With this view, he sent his uncle Don Ferdinand de Hizar to mediate a peace between his brother Don Frederic, king of Sicily, and his father-in-law Charles, king of Naples, and afterwards joined with the king of Portugal as a mediator between the two crowns <sup>1</sup>. He procured from pope John the twenty-second the approbation of the new order of Montesa, which he erected in the kingdom of Valentia, and upon which he bestowed the estates of the templars. He procured also from the same pope, the erection of Saragossa into an archbishopric, and compelled some of his nobility, who had taken up arms to decide their disputes, to lay them down, and to submit to the determination of the laws <sup>m</sup>.

The very singular and extraordinary case of the infant Don Jayme.

ALL the satisfaction this great king enjoyed, from a continued series of prosperous events, was not a little disturbed by the untoward disposition and unexampled obstinacy of his eldest son, the infant Don Jayme, whom with great difficulty, and not without a mixture of force, the king brought to espouse Donna Eleonora of Castile, whom he quitted immediately <sup>n</sup>. Upon this, his father threatened him (perhaps without intending it) with the loss of his succession; to which the infant replied, that all the favour he asked was leave to renounce it <sup>o</sup>. Mariana has given us a very fine speech of the king upon this occasion, and it is very certain, that he omitted nothing that could be offered to make the young man quit this resolution. He was however inflexible. He said, he despised a life of care, and thought it not at all paid for by a crown; that he loved privacy and ease, and thought them very cheaply purchased at this expence; that he knew many bad things had been done to acquire crowns, but that he thought there was no crime in declining one, that was his indubitable right. Upon this, the king called an assembly of the states, where, on the fourteenth day of December, the infant Don Jayme freely renounced all title to the crown, and the states with his consent, and in his presence, took an oath of fealty to his brother the infant Don Alonso. <sup>p</sup> Don

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, MALESPINI Hist. Florentin. <sup>m</sup> RAYNALD, ZURITA, ABARCA. <sup>n</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Alonso XI. RODERIC TOLET, de rebus Hispan. FERRERAS. <sup>o</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA. <sup>p</sup> Historia general de Espana, lib. xii. ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.

Jayme of his own accord assumed the habit of Calatrava, and soon after changed it for that of Mon<sup>e</sup>esa. His subsequent course of life shewed, that he was not without vices and follies, but ambition was not amongst the number of the former, or unsteadiness of the latter. He passed his time in his own way, and lived and died content <sup>9</sup>. In the same assembly of the states, Arragon, Valentia and Catalonia were united, and declared to be inseparable in time to come <sup>1</sup>.

A. D.
1319.

THE next year was distinguished by another singularity The infant in the king's family. His son, the infant Don Juan, being Don Juan elected archbishop of Toledo, and that election being con- of Arra- firmed by the pope, he was consecrated in the presence of gon conse- his father with great solemnity at Lerida, by Don Ximenes crated de Luna, archbishop of Tarragona, and Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of Tole- archbishop of Saragossa. He was no sooner in the possession do. of his new dignity than he began to exercise acts of primacy, upon which the two archbishops excommunicated him; the king was exceedingly offended; but when those prelates told him, that they did it to vindicate the independency of the crown of Arragon upon that of Castile, he was very much softened, and advised his son to go to his church, where this extraordinary conduct did not a little recommend him <sup>1</sup>. A new war having broke out between Frederic, king of Sicily, and his brother-in-law Robert, king of Naples, the king of Arragon desired the pope to interpose, and at the same time demanded his permission to send two ships richly laden into the dominions of the infidels, to procure the liberty of multitudes of his subjects, Arragonians and Catalans, that were prisoners there, which was readily granted <sup>1</sup>.

1320.

THE queen Donna Maria dying, the king soon after States of married a third time, Donna Elizinda de Moncada <sup>2</sup>. An Arragon assembly of the states being held at Lerida, the king laid be- and Cata- fore them his title to the island of Sardinia, and likewise lonia ap- informed them, that the inhabitants, weary of the tyranny prove the of the Pisans, had pressed him to deliver them; that how- expedition against Sardinia. ever, as he could do nothing without their assistance, he would not do any thing without their advice. The states answered, that he was bound in honour as a king to prosecute his right; that it was his duty to relieve the misera-

<sup>9</sup> MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>1</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA.
<sup>2</sup> RAINALD, RODERIC TOLET. de rebus Hispan. ZURITA.
<sup>1</sup> RAINALD, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.
<sup>2</sup> ZURITA.

ble ; and that whatever he thought reasonable to ask, they were ready to grant. Don Sancho, king of Majorca, who was present, did homage for his dominions, and offered to serve in this expedition with twenty gallies. The infant Don Alonso was declared admiral and commander in chief, and, having hoisted his flag in the harbour of Barcelona, had quickly a fleet and army sufficient for the conquests he was about to undertake <sup>w</sup>.

Undertaken by the infant Don Alonso, conducted with prudence, and ended with success.

A. D.
1323.

BUT the king was advised to delay the expedition a little, till it should be seen what favours the pope would grant him, in respect of levying money upon the clergy, and also what dependence might be placed upon the assurances he had received from some of the nobility, and many of the inhabitants of the island of Sardinia. In regard to the court of Rome, he found himself absolutely disappointed ; the pope grew jealous of his power, and therefore would contribute nothing towards making him so near a neighbour. In Sardinia some of the nobles took up arms in favour of the king of Arragon, surprized several of the garrisons belonging to the Pisans, and, having given the highest demonstrations of their fidelity by beginning the war, pressed the king of Arragon not to abandon them <sup>x</sup>. As this was never his intention, and as his preparations had been still going on, there was nothing farther necessary than to send his orders for the prince to embark, having previously sent a small squadron, with a supply of troops and provisions, to the lords who had taken up arms. The prince sailed on the fifth of June with a fleet of sixty men of war and gallies, and two hundred and forty transports <sup>y</sup>. Upon his arriving happily in the port of Palma, and debarking his forces, many of the nobility and gentry came in, and acknowledged the king of Arragon for their sovereign ; by whose advice the prince invested Izlegias and Cagliari, the two principal places in the island, at the same time. Both these places made a good defence, and the Pisans, on their side, used their utmost endeavours to relieve them ; so that it was the seventh of February, in the year following, before the first of them surrendered, and the latter held out near a year, and was rendered at length upon terms, the republic of Pisa being to hold the city and castle as vassals to the king of Arragon, and to put the rest of the island into his hands <sup>z</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> ABARCA, ZUPITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>x</sup> RAI-
NALD, MALESPINI Hist. Florent. ZURITA. <sup>y</sup> HIERONYME BLANCÆ, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>z</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florent. MARIANA, FERRERAS.

THIS treaty being carried into execution, the infant Don Alonso returned into his father's dominions, and landed at Barcelona, on the second of August. In his absence, and while he was dangerously ill, at the siege of Cagliari, his brother Don Pedro had prevailed upon their father to create him count of Ribagorça and Ampurias with very great solemnity, and, as some writers say, in case of Don Alonso's death, he was in hopes of defeating his nephews of the succession: his father, to prevent any intrigues of this sort, gave him the command of the auxiliary troops, with which he was obliged to furnish the pope, in consideration of his grant of the islands of Sardinia and Corfica; for, besides two thousand marks of silver, he was to send a hundred horse, and five hundred foot, to serve in the wars of the church <sup>a</sup>. On the arrival of Don Pedro, the pope remitted half of this for ten years. On the fourth of September died Don Sancho, king of Majorca; upon which, Don Jayme signified his intention to unite those islands to his other dominions; but the infant Don Philip, who had embraced an ecclesiastical life, having demonstrated to the king, that Don Jayme, the son of the infant Don Ferdinand of Majorca, was the lawful heir, and called to the succession by the will of the deceased king, the king of Arragon declared, that he would be as tender of another's rights as of his own, and relinquished all claim, but that of appointing the infant Don Philip his uncle guardian of the young prince <sup>b</sup>.

THE fleet of Arragon had scarce quitted the coast of Sardinia before troubles broke out there; which, however, were quickly appeased. However, the potent family of Oria, and the marquis de Malespini, not finding their account, at least in the degree they expected, from this revolution, changed sides, and, in conjunction with the Pisans, renewed the war <sup>c</sup>. The king of Arragon sent immediately a squadron of twelve sail with a fresh body of troops into the island. The Pisans were no sooner informed of this, and that the castle of Cagliari was closely blocked up, than they fitted out a strong fleet under the command of Gaspar Oria; but admiral Carroz, with the fleet of Arragon, lying before the harbour of Cagliari, prevented their entrance, and, after a very sharp and bloody dispute, beat and dispersed them <sup>d</sup>. In Arragon, the king held the states general at Saragossa,

He defeats his uncle's scheme, and procures his son to be acknowledged successor to the king.

A. D.
1325.

<sup>a</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>b</sup> RAINALD, ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>c</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florentin, ZURITA, <sup>d</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, MARIANA,

where, at the instance of the infant Don Alonso; his son Don Pedro was acknowledged heir to the crown, in case his father should die in the life-time of the king; with which his uncle Don Pedro, count of Ribagorça, was so highly offended, that he withdrew from the assembly, with all the lords of his party <sup>c</sup>.

The king dies with very great esteem, and in possession of the hearts of his subjects.

A. D.
1326.

THE infant Don Juan, the king's uncle, archbishop of Toledo, and chancellor of Castile, having lost the favour of the king Don Alonso the eleventh, and being deprived of his high office, exchanged his archbishopric for that of Tarragona <sup>f</sup>. In Sardinia, Don Raymond de Paralta and admiral Carroz pushed the war with so much vigour and success, that at length the Pisans offered to evacuate the island, which they were permitted to do, in virtue of a treaty made for that purpose. The marquis de Malespini and the malecontents, having now lost all support, applied themselves to the king of Arragon, to know what fate they were to expect: who, in return, acquainted them, that, in case they could forget their former seditious inclinations, they might depend upon the same favour and protection that was shewn to the rest of his subjects; upon which they laid down their arms, and returned to the quiet enjoyment of their estates <sup>g</sup>. The pope being engaged in a war against the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the king of Arragon sent his son the infant Don Pedro with the auxiliaries that he was bound to furnish, as feudatory to the holy see for the island of Sardinia <sup>h</sup>. On the eighteenth day of October died Donna Theresa, the consort of Don Alonso; by whom she had three children, Don Pedro, Don Jayme, and Donna Constantia. Upon the last day of the same month deceased the king Don Jayme, surnamed very deservedly the just, infinitely regretted by all his subjects, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, and when his glory was at its highest pitch <sup>i</sup>.

Don Alonso IV. succeeded his father with universal approbation, and was crowned with great solemnity on the feast of Whitsunday following, in the cathedral church of Saragossa, by Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of that city, in the presence of the states, who were then assembled <sup>k</sup>. Upon this occasion, the king made many knights, and amongst them his son Don Jayme, whom he created count of Urgel.
Don Alonso IV. succeeds his father, and espouses the infant Leonor of Castile.

<sup>c</sup> ZURITA. <sup>f</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Alonso XI. ABARCA. <sup>g</sup> MALESPINI Hist. Florentin. ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>h</sup> RAINALD. <sup>i</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>k</sup> ZURITA.

He also concluded a treaty with the kings of Tunis and Tremecen, to whom he was become very formidable by his possession of Sardinia<sup>1</sup>. In the beginning of the succeeding year, he had an interview with Don Alonso of Castile, with whom he concluded a very close alliance, and, as the seal of it, espoused his sister the infanta Donna Leonora; and, at the close of the year, that princess was delivered of Don Ferdinand, whom his father created marquis of Tortosa, and lord of Albarracin<sup>m</sup>. In consequence of his treaty with Castile, he found himself obliged to take some share in the war with the Moors, and accordingly acted against the king of Granada both by land and sea; though the Castilian writers would persuade us, that he was a little negligent in that war, on account of his own disputes with the Genoese<sup>n</sup>. It is indeed true, that the republic of Genoa having excited the malecontents to take up arms, and furnished them with assistance, the king, provoked by this behaviour, entered into a war with them, which was both long and bloody; but that this did not hinder him from executing his treaty with Castile, appears incontestible from hence, that the king of Granada had no sooner concluded a truce with Don Alonso of Castile, than he marched a numerous army through Murcia into Valentia, where they wasted the whole country with fire and sword<sup>o</sup>.

A. D.
1330.

THE pope and the king of Naples interposed with Don Alonso of Arragon, in favour of the Genoese, who, finding their whole coast destroyed by the king's fleet, seemed desirous of putting an end to the quarrel. Don Alonso answered, that when they withdrew the troops they had in Sardinia, and gave him proper assurances that they would give no farther assistance to the rebels in that island, he would forget what was past, and live with them as friends for the future; but that, while he continued their enemy, he would endeavour to make them sensible, they had not consulted their interest in giving him offence, neither was he induced to alter his opinion by their sending a fleet of forty men of war and gallies, to ravage the coasts of Catalonia and Valentia. These afterwards made an attempt upon Sardinia, where they were so warmly received, that they retired with loss, as the Moors of Granada likewise did, who had made another irruption into the kingdom of Valentia, upon the king's advancing towards them with a numerous army: so that

<sup>1</sup> ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.
Don Alonso XI.

<sup>m</sup> Cronica del Rey
<sup>n</sup> Chron. var. Antiq.

<sup>o</sup> ZURITA,
FERRERAS.

abroad things went as well as the king could desire; and if they had remained in quiet at home, there could have been nothing left for them to wish: but the same spirit of discord that disturbs private families, in finding a passage into those of kings, excites national discontents <sup>p</sup>.

Unhappy
in his family, from what cause, and in what an high degree.

To conceive this matter clearly, it is requisite to observe, that the generosity of this monarch was so well known as to excite, soon after his accession, an application from the states to prevent his granting away any of the demesnes of the crown; which he took to be so reasonable, that he promised upon oath not to make any grants for ten years to come. This oath, his son the infant Don Pedro apprehended to be infringed, by his bestowing Tortosa and Albarracin on the infant Don Ferdinand, of which he complained loudly. On the other hand, the king declared, that when he made that oath he had no thought of precluding himself from the right of providing for his children; and, by the advice of his young queen Leonora, banished Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of Saragossa, who, as she surmised, had put this into the infant's head <sup>q</sup>. This irritated Don Pedro to such a degree, that he surprized Xativa, which was one of the places the king had assigned Donna Leonora for her jointure. The queen, who was very sensible that the king's ill state of health, who was at that time very much afflicted with the dropsy, was what chiefly encouraged the infant to these excesses, applied to her brother, who refused to interfere at all during the life-time of the monarch, who had rejected the applications of Don Juan Emanuel and the rest of the malcontents, with great prudence and honour; but assured her, that if, upon his demise, his successor did her any injustice, she might rely upon his protection<sup>r</sup>. The infant, to strengthen his party, laboured, with the consent of his father, to marry the heiress of Navarre. This year was fatal to two princes of the royal blood, the infant Don Juan, patriarch of Alexandria, and archbishop of Tarragona, less distinguished by his birth and titles than by his virtues; and the infant Don Jayme, who, as we have before observed, preferred a private life to the splendour of a crown; and, after he made that choice, never gave any sign of dissatisfaction, or the slightest grounds of suspicion <sup>s</sup>.

A. D.
1334.

<sup>p</sup> RAINALD, MALESPINI Hist. Florentin. ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>q</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>r</sup> Cronica del Rey Don Alonso. <sup>s</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.

IN the beginning of the succeeding year, the marriage of Dies with the infant Don Pedro was concluded by the archbishop of the sincere Saragossa with Donna Maria, princess of Navarre, though affection it was at first intended he should have married her eldest of his sub- sister Donna Joanna; but it seems he liked the younger bet- jects, and ter, and insisted upon her being declared heiress of the king- highly re- dom, in prejudice of her elder sister, who, after this affront, spected by married the viscount of Roan<sup>1</sup>. It was in consideration of this marriage, that the infant engaged himself precipitately in favour of the people of Navarre, in the invasion they made upon Castile, where he received that chastisement that was due to his folly, as we have shewn in its proper place. The king, Don Alonso of Arragon, made this year a tour into Valentia, in hopes the air of that country might have contributed to his recovery; and, while he was there, he received ambassadors from the king of Granada, with whom he concluded a peace<sup>2</sup>. The war in Sardinia still subsisted, and, in its consequences, had created some disputes between the crown of Arragon and the pope; the king insisting, on the one side, to be released from the tribute he paid for the island of Sardinia, since the whole of it was not in his possession; and the pope complaining, that the admiral of Arragon had acted to the prejudice of Robert, king of Naples<sup>3</sup>. Don Juan Emanuel threw himself, at this time, upon the king's protection, who, though he would give him no assistance towards the execution of his project, did not think fit to deny him a retreat in his dominions, out of respect to his birth. The care of his physicians, and the mild climate of Valentia, proving ineffectual for the king's relief, he departed this life on the twenty-fourth of January, one thousand three hundred and thirty-six, in the ninth year of his reign, having merited, by the gentleness of his administration, the surname of the kind<sup>4</sup>.

A. D.
1335.

DON Pedro the fourth felt all the cares and anxieties of Don Pe- royalty, from the moment he became a king. The queen his dro IV. mother-in-law, Donna Leonora, with the assistance of Don succeeds Pedro Exerica, and some other persons of quality, took the his father, necessary measures to provide for the security of herself and and meets her children, though, at the same time, she wrote in very with much plausible terms to the king<sup>5</sup>. The inhabitants of Catalonia discord and trouble.

<sup>1</sup> P. MORET. ABARCA.      <sup>2</sup> RODERIC TOLET. de Rebus Hispan. ZURITA.      <sup>3</sup> RAINALD, MALESPINI Hist. Florent. ABARCA.      <sup>4</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TU QUET.      <sup>5</sup> ZURITA.

him to go a little too quick, he, who performed the same office to the king of Majorca, struck both the horse and the man : upon which the king of Arragon laid his hand upon his sword ; but his uncle Don Pedro interposing things went no farther <sup>1</sup>. The fleet of Arragon served with great reputation this year against the Moors, but the admiral who commanded it, had the misfortune to be killed at the siege of Algezira, to the great mortification of the king of Castile as well as of his master <sup>2</sup>. The precautions taken by Don Pedro in repairing and fortifying all the strong places in Valentia, and the keeping a stout squadron upon the coast, prevented, or rather put it out of the power of, the king of Morocco to execute the invasion that he intended : so that the young monarch raised a high reputation, which however was chiefly owing to the prudent councils of his uncle Don Pedro, who managed the great influence he had over him entirely to the benefit of his subjects, and the honour of the crown <sup>3</sup>.

The pope presses the king and archbishops of Arragon to drive out the Moors and Jews. THE pope being well informed, that the reason why the king of Arragon was so exceedingly apprehensive of the Moors making a descent in his dominions, was the number of Mohammedans and Jews that inhabited Valentia, wrote to him in very pressing terms to drive them all out, and sent briefs upon the same subject to the archbishops of Tarragona and Saragossa ; but the king, who knew that a great part of his revenue arose from the industry of the one, and the commerce of the other, was in no great hurry to pursue this ecclesiastical advice, but chose rather to reap the benefit of their stay, and to guard as well as he could against the inconveniencies attending it <sup>4</sup>. The people of Corfica, perceiving that the lords in Sardinia, who had embraced the party of the crown of Arragon, were infinitely more at ease than themselves, began to wish they were under the same sovereign ; and Hugo Cortingo and Lope Cinerecha, who were the principal persons in that island, dispatched the bishop of Aleria to assure him that if he would but afford them the countenance of a fleet they would revolt, and put the island into his hands ; but Don Pedro had at that time so many things to attend, that he gave these lords a fair answer, yet did not accept of their proposal <sup>5</sup>. However, he sent his uncle Don Sancho to Rome, to solicit a grant of the tenths of the clergy for three years, in consideration of his war against the Moors, and to remit the tribute of the island of Sardinia, since he did not receive so much out of its revenues °.

A. D.
1310.

<sup>1</sup> RAINALD, ABRACA, MARIANA. <sup>2</sup> ZURITA. <sup>3</sup> ABRACA, FERRERAS, &C. <sup>4</sup> RAINALD. <sup>5</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.

His spleen against Don Jayme, king of Majorca, rose so high, that, notwithstanding that monarch had married his sister, he resolved to dispossess him of his dominions, which seemed a work of no great difficulty, since, by a very unreasonable affectation of independency, he had drawn upon himself the arms of the king of France, and was already stripped of most of the countries he held in that kingdom, and had taxed his subjects in the islands so high, that they solicited the king of Arragon to take them under his protection<sup>p</sup>.

The king of Arragon determines to dispossess the king of Majorca of his dominions.

According to some writers, the king of Arragon had been instrumental in exciting his brother-in-law to refuse homage to the French king, on purpose to bring him into difficulties; and indeed there is great reason to believe, that what they have delivered on this subject is true. For, in the midst of his distress, and when he was daily soliciting relief, he summoned him to appear, in the assembly of the states of Barcelona, to answer for the non-payment of tribute, for presuming to enter into a war with France without his permission, and for coining money, which, as his feudatory, he had no right to do. About the same time, he sent his brother Don Jayme to fetch over the queen of Majorca, his sister; and that unfortunate monarch her husband, seeing plainly that his ruin was designed, in a high fit of resentment began first: He renounced his homage to Don Pedro, proclaimed war against him, challenged him, and seized all the merchandize belonging to his subjects that were in his dominions<sup>q</sup>. Don Pedro, who expected all this, withdrew his fleet from the coast of Castile, where it had performed great things, and took all his measures with such an air of incertainty and trouble, as if he had been apprehensive of danger from a prince, whom he was contriving to dispossess of all his dominions, and made no doubt of performing it in a single campaign. We shall be obliged to mention these transactions again in another place, and shall therefore run over the capital points briefly here.

A. D.
1341.

1342.

THE situation of things in Europe, at that time, put it fully in the power of the king of Arragon to execute all he intended, with the same ease and promptitude with which it had been contrived; and he went through every step of it

Executes his scheme with great vivacity and inex-

° RAINALD, FERRERAS. P ZURITA, ABARCA. q HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

tinguish-
able resentment.

A. D.
1343.

with the same stern unrelenting severity that he had shewn in his first proceedings. He began by declaring roundly on the eighteenth of February at Barcelona, that the king of Majorca stood deprived, for his contumacy and rebellion, of all his dominions; and, at the same time he made this declaration, he ordered his brother to fall with a strong corps of troops into Roussillon<sup>r</sup>. He embarked in person on board his fleet with fifteen thousand foot and three hundred horse, and with this force he debarked in Majorca, on the twenty-fifth of May. The king Don Jayme had a considerable body of troops in good order, with which he thought it very practicable, either to have prevented Don Pedro's landing, or with some advantage to have given him battle after he was landed. But alas! he was very little acquainted with his own circumstances; since no sooner was Don Pedro in the field, and in a condition to act, but, according to the assurances they had given, the whole, or at least the far greatest part, of the king of Majorca's army deserted; so that he was forced, in a week's time, to embark with a few faithful friends on board a small ship, which landed him safely in France<sup>s</sup>. Don Pedro, on the other hand, made a solemn and splendid entry into the capital, and promised the inhabitants, that their island should never be detached from the dominions of Arragon more; and having left a force sufficient to secure that, and reduce the two other islands of Minorca and Ivica, he returned into his own territories, fully determined to strip this miserable prince of the poor remains he had still left<sup>t</sup>: in which he made a considerable progress the same year; but, at the request of the pope's legate, towards the close of it, he consented to a truce for eight months. This seemed to be the effects of pity, but proceeded in reality from policy; for his funds being exhausted, he was obliged to put his army into winter quarters<sup>u</sup>.

1344.

Shews no pity for that monarch,
when he came and submitted to his mercy.

As soon as the truce expired, which was in the month of May following, without paying the least attention to the interposition of the pope and other Christian princes, he resumed the war with such rigour, and with so great a superiority, that the unfortunate king of Majorca, who had shut himself up in Perpignan, finding it impossible to make any resistance, had recourse to his clemency; and, being introduced into his presence by Don Pedro Exerica, bending one knee to the ground, he humbly acknowledged his indiscretion, and besought him to remember, that he was a king, a prince

<sup>r</sup> ZURITA.
ABARCA.

<sup>s</sup> MEZERAY, MARIANA.
<sup>u</sup> RAINALD.

<sup>t</sup> ZURITA,

of his own blood, his brother in-law, and that his children were his nephews. To which Don Pedro very drily answered, that, upon the surrender of Perpignan, he might merit his pity. It was accordingly surrendered, and the king of Arragon made his public entry into it, on the sixteenth of July; and, on the twenty-second of the same month, he published an edict, by which the county of Roussillon, and all the states dependent upon it, were re-united for ever to the crown of Arragon *. He carried his vengeance still farther; under pretence of expressing his pity, he declared, that if the unfortunate Don Jayme would lay aside the title of king, he would allow him an annuity of ten thousand livres per annum, and permit him to enjoy some estates he had still left in France, which, as he foresaw, drove that undone prince into despair. All that was left in his power was, to express his rage against the king of Arragon in the roughest terms, and the companions of his ill fortune threw out reproaches of the same kind against Don Pedro Exerica, which however were very ill founded, and had like to have been attended with very fatal consequences: at length, not knowing where to hide his head, the count of Foix generously afforded him a retreat, which gave the king of Arragon infinite disquiet †.

THE pope and the king of France made still some shew of soliciting, in favour of the dethroned king. But Don Pedro was a thorough politician, took his measures so well, rendered himself so formidable, and applied his presents and his promises with such propriety, that he quieted Clement the sixth †; and by proposing a marriage between his daughter and the grandson of the French king, he stopped all solicitations from that quarter ‡. He discovered some inclination to revive his disputes with the queen-dowager, and his brothers; but Don Alonso of Castile sustained their interests in a very different manner from that which had been shewn by the pretended friends of the king of Majorca; upon which, as his interest directed, Don Pedro thought fit to desist ‡. He was now become odious, but, at the same time, terrible to his neighbours: however, the Genoese and the Pisans were in great hopes, with the assistance of some exiled malecontents, to have it in their power to expell his forces out of Sardinia.

THE scheme was well laid, and, in all probability, would have had its effect, but Don Pedro's politics dissipated the

Softens the pope and the crown of France, in the business of the king of Majorca.
A. D. 1345.

Defeats the schemes of the Ge-

* ZURITA, FERRERAS. † MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, MEZERAY. ‡ RAINALD. † ZURITA, MEZERAY. ‡ RODERIC TOLET. de rebus Hispan. LUC. Tudens. Chron.

noese and storm; he made a strict alliance with the Venetians, which gave him a superiority at sea, and, as if it had been the pure effects of clemency, he granted a pardon without restrictions, and restored all the exiles to their estates, so that of conspirators they became courtiers in an instant: and thus the schemes of the two republics were absolutely defeated <sup>b</sup>. The constant success that had attended his negotiations and his arms, cherished that ambition, which was natural to Don Pedro, and encouraged him to believe, that he might execute without difficulty what none of his predecessors durst have attempted. He had already awed the states into many things, and he resolved to exert his utmost policy and power to procure their concurrence in a measure, which he knew the best part of them must consider as directly contrary to the constitution: a thing hitherto unpractised in Arragon, where preceding kings had made the protection of the public liberty the ruling maxim of their administrations.

Forms a design of altering
the succession in favour of the infan-
tas his daughters.

A. D.
1347.

WE have before observed, that in his marriage with the infanta Donna Maria of Navarre, he had stipulated an infraction of the rule of succession in that kingdom; and as he had by this princess three daughters, the infantas Constantia, Johanna, and Maria, he determined to set aside his brothers, and to engage the states to entail his whole dominions upon the infanta Donna Constantia. The first step he took, in order to this, was to establish a commission of twenty-two divines and civil lawyers, and of these nineteen declared the king's proposition to be conformable to the laws of Arragon <sup>c</sup>. Ferreras, and some other writers, seem to be also of this opinion; but the ablest and most learned of the historians of Arragon are of the other side <sup>d</sup>. It is not our business to interfere in this dispute, but it is our duty to report facts, and this, which is before us, makes it evident, that the rule of succession in Arragon was otherwise; for, if it had not, the king stood in no need of a new law, but might have trusted the succession to the regulation of the states upon his demise. On the other hand, the infant Don Jayme, who conceived himself to be exceedingly injured by this disposition, associated the principal nobility of Arragon, who charged the king with violating their privileges in many particulars, in that kind of confederacy to which they gave the name of the union, and declared himself their head;

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. <sup>d</sup> Historia de Espana, sec. xiii. ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.

upon which the king deprived him of his post of lieutenant general of the kingdom of Valentia, forbid him to enter that city upon any pretence, and extended this prohibition also to Barcelona, Lerida, and Saragossa <sup>e</sup>. In this situation of things, an event happened that might have changed the face of them entirely, which was, the queen Donna Maria's being brought to bed at Valentia of a son, but this young prince died the same day, and, on the fifth day after, his mother also expired <sup>f</sup>.

THE king Don Pedro having information that the queen His brother Don dowager had proposed to the court of Portugal a marriage between her son the infant Don Ferdinand, and the infanta Jayne re- Donna Leonora, he dispatched a minister of his to Lisbon, to vives a- solicit that princess for himself, in which, by the help of gainst him an infinity of intrigues, he prevailed <sup>g</sup>. The dethroned king the union of Majorca made an attempt upon that country, but without of Arra- effect; the same spirit that had driven him out, inducing the people to keep him out; so that, with a few forces he brought with him, he was forced to embark again, and retire into France <sup>h</sup>. The news of this invasion, and of his brother Don Jayne's being invited by the nobility and people to Saragossa, in quality of head of the league, induced the king Don Pedro to go into Catalonia to keep that country quiet. He had no sooner quitted Valentia than the nobility and people of that kingdom likewise formed a union, of which they made the infant Don Ferdinand chief. Don Pedro, soon after his arrival at Barcelona, dispatched an able minister to the court of Castile to dissuade the king from entertaining any correspondence with the union of Arragon, assuring him he would consider his sister the queen-dowager's interest as his own, provided he would give no assistance to that assembly, which the king readily promised; but, at the same time, allowed the infant Don Ferdinand to raise eight hundred men in his dominions <sup>i</sup>. On the other hand, Don Pedro licensed Michael Perez Zapata to become a mighty warm patriot, that, by insinuating himself with the principal persons engaged in the union, he might either bring them into the king's measures, or raise disputes among themselves; but, for the present, this project likewise failed. The king was on the point of quitting Catalonia, when he understood that the king of Majorca, with a small body of troops, had penetrated into Roussillon. Upon this he marched thither, attacked, and defeated him; and, having provided for the security of that country, returned into Arragon, where he found himself obliged by the union to call an assembly of the states at Saragossa <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>e</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>g</sup> EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA BRANDAON, ABARCA. <sup>h</sup> MEZERAY, FERRERAS. <sup>i</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Alonso X. ZURITA.

He is constrained to call an assembly of the states, and to make therein great concessions.

HE saw clearly, that he should be obliged to make many concessions; and therefore, the day before the states met, he privately made a protest, that whatever acts he did or signed in that assembly were null and void, as being against his opinion, and under compulsion. Fortified with this unkingly evasion he met the states, made them a long artful disingenuous speech, and heard very patiently all the disagreeable things they had to say; for without scruple they told him to his face, that his reign had been hitherto a continued series of breaches upon their constitution; that, by bestowing public employments upon bad men, he had made the people of Arragon pay the wages of those who laboured for their destruction; that, for the future therefore, he must think of governing by law; of removing these dangerous people from about his person; and of receiving his ministers, governors, and generals upon the recommendation of the states: which, if he hesitated to do, they would elect a new king. He seemed to take no offence at this, but contented himself with observing, that it was improper for persons in such an assembly to come armed; which he did in favour of his own partizans, who were afraid of declaring themselves upon that account: the assembly thereupon made an order, that for the future none should appear armed in their debates. The king, now secure of a party, came the next day, and falling upon his brother Don Jayme, in a set speech told him, he was an unnatural and perfidious rebel, and his associates traitors. The infant excused himself very modestly, hinted at the services he had done his country, which, he said, were overpaid by the honour they had done him in electing him head of the union; but some of the members who were near the door opened it, and exclaimed, that the king had violated the privileges of the states, and that it was doubtful whether their lives were secure. Upon which, a multitude of people armed burst in, and the king was indebted to his brother, and the chiefs of the malecontents, that he went away alive <sup>l</sup>.

Poisons his brother at Barcelo-

THE infant, and some of the principal nobility, attended him to Barcelona, where the queen was expected, and

<sup>k</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>l</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro X. ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

where, while they waited for her, an apoplexy was so com-
 plaisant as to remove Don Jayme; which has induced the historians of Arragon to assert, that it was of the king's procuring <sup>m</sup>. It did not however contribute much to his advantage, since, while his marriage was celebrating with pomp and magnificence at Barcelona, Don Ferdinand was making a great progress, by force of arms, in the kingdom
 of Valentia, and, from his success there, was declared also head of the union of Arragon; into which kingdom he sent his brother Don Juan to supply his place <sup>n</sup>. In Sardinia
 also most of the great families had rebelled; upon which the king sent Hugo Cervelon with a supply to his brother the viceroy, which proved fatal to them both; for engaging the malecontents precipitately, they were, together with the viceroy's son, and all the Arragonian cavalry, cut to pieces <sup>o</sup>.

na, and marries Donna Le-
 onora of Portugal.

THE next year was still more fruitful of great events; indeed, there have seldom happened, in the same compass of time, so many extraordinary transactions in any kingdom.
 The union of Valentia went on raising troops, and the union of Barcelona, according to the league that was between them, sent a considerable reinforcement, under the command of Don Ximenez de Urrea and Don Lope de Luna, which last
 was privately in the king's interest, and, by picking a quarrel with his associates, debauched the best part of the troops, and defeated the service <sup>p</sup>. However, the infant Don Ferdinand was so well beloved, and the cause was so popular in *Valen-
 tia*, that he suffered nothing by this accident, but found himself very soon at the head of fifty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The king Don Pedro, who was at Morviedro, with a very small party, being apprehensive of his safety, judged it expedient to fortify the place, which occasioned a general insurrection of its inhabitants, who intended to have put to death the king's chief counsellors and favourites, but that they secured themselves by a timely retreat, and left the king to take care of himself. He pacified the people, by assuring them, that he sought only his own preservation; upon which they judged it best for him and for them, to conduct him with the queen to Valentia, where they were received with great respect <sup>q</sup>. In the mean time, the king laboured to bring off his brother the infant Don Ferdinand, by proposing to declare him lieutenant general of

In great danger
 from the confederates, sti-
 led the union in Valentia.

A. D.
 1348.

<sup>m</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.    <sup>n</sup> Chronica del Rey
 Don Pedro IV.    <sup>o</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA.    <sup>p</sup> Chronica del
 Rey Don Pedro IV.    <sup>q</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI
 BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.

his own dominions, and his successor, in case he died without issue male ; but the infant answered very firmly, that betraying the trust his country had reposed in him, was not the proper way to merit a crown<sup>r</sup>. Don Pedro then demanded of the king of Castile leave to levy some horse in his dominions, which, because it could not be decently refused, and was thought of no great consequence, was granted ; and accordingly Don Alvaro Garcia de Albornoz, who was related to Don Lope de Luna, raised, for Don Pedro's service, six hundred Castilian horse.

The confederates in Arragon entirely defeated, and Saragossa taken by Don Pedro.

By the ill conduct of the king's favourites, a sedition was excited in Valentia ; the populace besieging the palace, and threatening Don Bernard de Cabrera, and Don Berenger de Arbella with death. The king, though a prince of great courage, was in much confusion ; but Don Pedro de Moncado advising him to go out with arms in his hand, and assuring him, that his presence would disperse the populace, he ventured upon that dangerous experiment, and, meeting with success, never apprehended any thing from popular tumults after<sup>r</sup>. His favourites, in the mean time, fled to Barcelona, and procuring an address from thence to the king, he followed them<sup>r</sup>. The union of Arragon being persuaded, that the king was assembling troops against them, solicited the infant Don Ferdinand to disperse them, which he very gallantly attempted ; but through the unexpected junction of Don Lope de Luna with his forces, and those commanded by Don Alvaro de Garcia Albornoz, the forces of the union were defeated, the infant wounded, and taken prisoner, but, as it fell out very luckily for him, by the Castilians, who treated him with great respect, and amongst whom his person was in safety<sup>r</sup>. Don Pedro declared Don Lope, count de Luna, the first subject in Arragon, who had this title, and upon this victory marched directly to Saragossa, where he declared null and void the concessions he had made to the union ; and, after having put the whole city in the utmost fear, executed thirteen of the principal persons in it ; and thus, by a single miscarriage, the union of Arragon was dissipated<sup>w</sup>.

A like fate attends the union in Valentia,

This scarce appeared any thing in the view of that high-spirited prince, since the union of Valentia still subsisted ; and, notwithstanding what had happened at Saragossa, made

<sup>r</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. MARIANA. <sup>s</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, Chronica del Rey Don Pedro. <sup>t</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA. <sup>u</sup> RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LVC. Tudens. Chron. <sup>w</sup> Chron. de Don Pedro IV,

no overtures of submission. The next point, therefore, was all things to subdue them; to which the king marched with his victorious army. The quarrel was decided by a battle, in which being at the king's mercy. the nobility of Arragon behaved very gallantly, and those of Valentia with all the fury that could be inspired by despair; so that, in the event they were rather butchered than beat: since nothing, but the loss of their troops, could have lost the battle; which left the best part of the kingdom, and the capital, wholly at the king's mercy *. In the first transport of his rage, he talked of giving it to the pillage of his soldiers, burning it to the ground, and sowing it with salt; but some of the lords that were about him moderated his passion, and hindered him from committing these excesses. However, he entered Valentia as a conqueror, sacrificed numbers of better men than himself to his ambition; and, as at Saragossa so here, he called for the roll of his concessions to the union, and destroyed it with his own hand †: forgetting, that the promises of a king are sacred, and that he becomes ipso facto a tyrant, who professes, that he borrows his authority from force. Don Alonso of Castile interceded with him in favour of his brother Don Ferdinand, and queen Leonora, offering to conclude a marriage between his son Don Henry, and one of the infantas of Arragon: Don Pedro answered, that the queen-dowager had intrigued, and Don Ferdinand fought against him; so that they had no favours to expect: but as the one had been his father's wife, and the other his father's son, they should peaceably enjoy what he had left them. In regard to the marriage, if he would restore him the kingdom of Murcia, and hold no correspondence with his malecontents, he was willing it should take effect ‡.

THE king had made Rimbao de Corbera viceroy of Sar- The inva- dinia, and he could not have confided that island to a per- son of son of greater courage or capacity. He quickly repaired Majorca the losses which his predecessors had sustained, and put by the de- things upon a right foot. But the Genoese having gained a throned great victory over the combined fleets of the emperor of Con- king, who stantinople, the king of Arragon, and the republic of Venice, is killed.
 and beginning to make a great naval armament, the viceroy fighting came himself to Barcelona, to obtain a proportionable supply bravely.
 of ships and men, which the king his master readily furnished §. About the time he put to sea, in his return to Sar-

A. D.
1349.

* HIERONYMUS BLANCÆ, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.
 † Chron. de Don Pedro IV.    § Chronica del Rey Don Alonso XI.
 • Chronica de Don Pedro IV.

dinia, there came intelligence, that the king of Majorca with his fleet and army was very likely to intercept him; upon which he debarked his forces in Majorca, where Don Jayme quickly after landed; and, upon Sunday the twenty-fifth of October, was defeated, or rather oppressed by numbers, and fighting courageously, refusing quarter, was slain <sup>b</sup>. His only son Jayme, after receiving a grievous wound in the face, was made prisoner, and carried by the admiral of Arragon, Don Pedro de Moncada, to his uncle, who received him graciously, and sent him to reside at Barcelona, ordering his father's body to be brought over, and buried in the cathedral church of Valentia <sup>c</sup>. The viceroy of Sardinia, after the defeat of the king of Majorca, re-imbarked his troops, and, upon his arrival in that island, settled every thing to the king's satisfaction.

Don Pedro causes the pope's legate to be hung up by the heels.

A. D.
1350.

1351.

HOWEVER, Don Pedro considering that it lay at a distance, and that whenever disturbances happened there, it gave him no small trouble, he signified to the malecontent lords, that if any thing could induce them to be quiet, he was inclined to do for them what they could desire; which, for the present, brought things into order <sup>d</sup>. The pope's legate Bernard Alanis, canon of the church of Valentia, having excommunicated some persons of high quality for not paying some ecclesiastical dues, the king commanded him to absolve them, and, upon his refusal, sent both him and his father to prison; which having no effect upon the legate, he ordered a gibbet to be erected upon the castle wall, and the legate to be hung up there by the feet, with an assurance, that if he did not do what the king directed, the rope should be cut, and he left to tumble down the rocks; but the canon having hung some time desired to be taken down, and did as the king desired <sup>e</sup>. The pope, as it might be well expected, took fire at this, and threatened the monarch of Arragon with all the thunder of the church; but the pope being poor, and the king rich and great, an embassy to Avignon, and a few good words, pacified all <sup>f</sup>. On the twenty-seventh of December, Donna Leonora, queen of Arragon, was brought to bed of the infant Don Juan, to whom at his birth the king gave the title of duke of Gironne; which, in succeeding times, became the title of course of the eldest sons of the kings of Arragon <sup>g</sup>. He renewed likewise his alliance with Don Pedro the cruel of Castile, and terminated, by a treaty with the crown of France, all points in difference about the territories formerly belonging to the king of Majorca <sup>b</sup>. He likewise, concluded a new treaty with the Vene- A. D.

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.      <sup>c</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA.      <sup>d</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV.      <sup>e</sup> ZURITA, A-BARCA.      <sup>f</sup> RAINALD, MAYERNE TURQUET.      <sup>g</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV.

tians against the Genoese, and, the civil war being again 1352.
 broke out in Sardinia, he sent a stout fleet to the assistance of his subjects, and of his allies.

THAT war becoming daily more serious, the king went His fleet,
 into Catalonia, to hold an assembly of the states, where he in conjunc-
 demanded a very large supply, which was granted him, and tion with having, in return, appointed Don Bernard de Cabrera, at the Vene-
 the request of the states, general and commander in chief, tian, de- he, to oblige them the more, gave him the county of Bas <sup>c</sup>. seats the
 At the time of the arrival of the count, Don Bernard the naval viceroy was employed in the siege of Algieri; to succour force of which place, the Genoese sent a fleet of five large men of Genoa.
 war, and fifty gallies, under the command of Antonio Gri- maldi, one of the best officers in their service. Upon this,
 the count Don Bernard quitted the siege, and, with the Ve- netian admiral Nicolo Pisano, who brought with him twenty gallies, went to offer the enemy battle. The Genoese, proud of their former naval victory, did not decline it, and on the twenty-seventh of August the fleets engaged with great fury
 and obstinacy on both sides. Some say, that the Venetian
 and Catalonian gallies were not only intermixed but chained
 together; however that might be, there is nothing more certain than that this was one of the hardest fought battles
 in those times; but, in the end, the confederates gained a complete victory, the Genoese losing no less than eight thousand men, amongst whom were many of their principal nobility, thirty-three gallies, and three thousand two hundred prisoners; on the part of the Catalans, three hundred and fifty men were killed, and two thousand wounded <sup>d</sup>. After this glorious success, Don Bernard returned to the siege of Algieri, which, having no farther succours to expect, surrendered upon terms, all the malecontents being allowed to march out, except Fabian Doria, whose head was struck off
 the next day <sup>e</sup>.

THE Genoese were under such a consternation at this de- Resolves to feat, that they submitted themselves to the duke of Milan; go in per-
 and, being very desirous to keep the war at a distance, partly son to put

<sup>b</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro de Pedro Lopez de Ayala, ME-
 ZERAY, ZURITA. <sup>c</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV. <sup>d</sup> ZU-
 RITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, FERRE-RAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>e</sup> ZURITA.

an end to the war
in Sardi-
nia.

A. D.
1353.

by money, partly by fair promises, excited a general insurrection in Sardinia, when the count Don Cabrera was on the very point of returning home. He debarked his troops again, and, having joined them with those of the viceroy, marched against the rebels, and gained a complete victory. However, finding that the Genoese had sent over a fresh supply of money and men, and were preparing a formidable fleet, he judged it expedient to return to Barcelona with his vessels, which stood in need of repair, in order to make a full report to the king of the situation things were in, and to explain to him the necessity of his going into Sardinia in person, if he judged the reduction of that island necessary to his glory, and the safety of his dominions <sup>m</sup>. On his arrival, he found the king was at Valentia; upon which he went thither, was very graciously received, his plan being approved, and himself sent back to Barcelona to assemble a fleet fit for such an expedition. In the mean time, the king went to each of the great cities in his dominions, and demanded contributions for the war, which were very chearfully and readily granted him <sup>n</sup>. In this progress, the king had a hint given him, that himself, and all his predecessors, had been extremely wanting to their own glory, and to the welfare of their subjects, in not erecting any where a public seminary for learning: of which he was so fully convinced, that, notwithstanding the pressing conjuncture of his affairs, he thought fit to found instantly a university at Huesca, which has since produced men of eminence in all kinds of learning <sup>o</sup>.

His expedition attended upon the whole with very indifferent success.

ALL the necessary preparations for the king's expedition being made, he went first to Barcelona, and from thence to Roses, where he embarked with the queen, and some of the principal nobility of his dominions, on the fifteenth of June. His army consisted of ten thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, his fleet of twenty-one sail of capital ships, and a hundred gallies; which sufficiently explains the great power of this monarch at sea, and how much it had been augmented in a short time. Upon his arrival, he found Algieri again in the hands of the rebels, and the Genoese; upon which he determined to besiege it by land and sea <sup>p</sup>. The Genoese, on the other hand, attempted to relieve it by a fleet, but desisted from their project, finding it impracticable. The judge of Arborea, who was at the head of the malecontents, was more successful; for understanding that the king's army suffered much from an epidemic distemper, and that himself was retired to Cagliari much indisposed, he marched by land to its relief, with twenty thousand men: upon which Don Pedro Exerica and Don Bernard de Cabrera, who commanded the siege, entered into a treaty with the judge, and, by granting him large terms for himself, induced him to abandon the Genoese. It was with some difficulty that the king was brought to consent to this, but, at length, having ratified the treaty, which he never intended to execute, the town, on the nineteenth of September, was put into his hands, and he caused it to be peopled immediately by his own subjects<sup>1</sup>. The next year, the king called an assembly of the states of this island at Cagliari, which instead of contributing, as he expected, to the pacification of the quarrels that had lasted so long, produced an unanimity of another kind, the issue of which was a general insurrection. His troops, however, had the good fortune to defeat the rebels in a general engagement; upon which, leaving the best part of his army behind, the king embarked for Barcelona<sup>2</sup>. After his return, he made a tour to Avignon, to regulate some affairs with the pope, where, at his request, he offered to make peace with the Genoese, provided they would evacuate Sardinia, as, on the other hand, he was inclinable to make a cession of Corfica, reserving an annual tribute of fifty thousand florins; but the negotiation being drawn into a great length, at last ended in nothing, though both parties were weary of the war<sup>3</sup>; but still their animosities ran too high to admit of peace.

<sup>m</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV.    <sup>n</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS.    <sup>o</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ZURITA, ABARCA.    <sup>p</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

A. D.
1354.

1355.

THE Genoese sending fresh troops into Sardinia, the king of Arragon made suitable preparations for the defence of that island, and committed the principal management of the war to Don Bernard de Cabrera, count of Offona<sup>4</sup>. While his affairs were thus embarrassed, Don Pedro the cruel of Castile, in a manner, forced a quarrel upon him, as we have shewn in its proper place. Don Pedro of Arragon would willingly have avoided it; but when he found this was not to be done with honour, he defended himself and his dominions with courage. His mother-in-law, and both his brothers, were in the interest, and at the court of the king of Castile; but, on the other hand, the count Don Henry and the count Don Fello, brothers to that prince, had fought and Forced into a war with Castile, by the arrogance and pride of Don Pedro the cruel.

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.<sup>2</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA.<sup>3</sup> RAI-

NALD, BALUZ, ZURITA.

<sup>4</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ

egibus Gestarum. ABARCA, MARIANA.

noese and storm; he made a strict alliance with the Venetians, which Pisans sp- gave him a superiority at sea, and, as if it had been the pure effects of clemency, he granted a pardon without restrictions, and restored all the exiles to their estates, so that of conspirators they became courtiers in an instant: and thus the schemes of the two republics were absolutely defeated <sup>b</sup>. The constant success that had attended his negotiations and his arms, cherished that ambition, which was natural to Don Pedro, and encouraged him to believe, that he might execute without difficulty what none of his predecessors durst have attempted. He had already awed the states into many things, and he resolved to exert his utmost policy and power to procure their concurrence in a measure, which he knew the best part of them must consider as directly contrary to the constitution: a thing hitherto unpractised in Arragon, where preceding kings had made the protection of the public liberty the ruling maxim of their administrations.

Forms a
design of altering
the succession in favour of the infan-
tas his daughters.

A. D.
1347.

WE have before observed, that in his marriage with the infanta Donna Maria of Navarre, he had stipulated an infraction of the rule of succession in that kingdom; and as he had by this princess three daughters, the infantas Constantia, Johanna, and Maria, he determined to set aside his brothers, and to engage the states to entail his whole dominions upon the infanta Donna Constantia. The first step he took, in order to this, was to establish a commission of twenty-two divines and civil lawyers, and of these nineteen declared the king's proposition to be conformable to the laws of Arragon <sup>c</sup>. Ferreras, and some other writers, seem to be also of this opinion; but the ablest and most learned of the historians of Arragon are of the other side <sup>d</sup>. It is not our business to interfere in this dispute, but it is our duty to report facts, and this, which is before us, makes it evident, that the rule of succession in Arragon was otherwise; for, if it had not, the king stood in no need of a new law, but might have trusted the succession to the regulation of the states upon his demise. On the other hand, the infant Don Jayme, who conceived himself to be exceedingly injured by this disposition, associated the principal nobility of Arragon, who charged the king with violating their privileges in many particulars, in that kind of confederacy to which they gave the name of the union, and declared himself their head;

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. <sup>d</sup> Historia de Espana, sec. xiii. ZURITA, HIBRONYMI BLANCÆ.

upon which the king deprived him of his post of lieutenant general of the kingdom of Valentia, forbid him to enter that city upon any pretence, and extended this prohibition also to Barcelona, Lerida, and Saragossa <sup>c</sup>. In this situation of things, an event happened that might have changed the face of them entirely, which was, the queen Donna Maria's being brought to bed at Valentia of a son, but this young prince died the same day, and, on the fifth day after, his mother also expired <sup>f</sup>.

THE king Don Pedro having information that the queen dowager had proposed to the court of Portugal a marriage between her son the infant Don Ferdinand, and the infanta Donna Leonora, he dispatched a minister of his to Lisbon, to solicit that princess for himself, in which, by the help of an infinity of intrigues, he prevailed <sup>g</sup>. The dethroned king of Majorca made an attempt upon that country, but without effect; the same spirit that had driven him out, inducing the people to keep him out; so that, with a few forces he brought with him, he was forced to embark again, and retire into France <sup>h</sup>. The news of this invasion, and of his brother Don Jayme's being invited by the nobility and people to Saragossa, in quality of head of the league, induced the king Don Pedro to go into Catalonia to keep that country quiet. He had no sooner quitted Valentia than the nobility and people of that kingdom likewise formed a union, of which they made the infant Don Ferdinand chief. Don Pedro, soon after his arrival at Barcelona, dispatched an able minister to the court of Castile to dissuade the king from entertaining any correspondence with the union of Arragon, assuring him he would consider his sister the queen-dowager's interest as his own, provided he would give no assistance to that assembly, which the king readily promised; but, at the same time, allowed the infant Don Ferdinand to raise eight hundred men in his dominions <sup>i</sup>. On the other hand, Don Pedro licensed Michael Perez Zapata to become a mighty warm patriot, that, by insinuating himself with the principal persons engaged in the union, he might either bring them into the king's measures, or raise disputes among themselves; but, for the present, this project likewise failed. The king was on the point of quitting Catalonia, when he understood that the king of Majorca, with a small body of troops, had penetrated into Roussillon. Upon this he marched thi-

His brother Don Jayme revives against him the union of Arragon.

<sup>c</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. MARIANA, FERRERAS.
<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>g</sup> EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA BRANDAON, ABARCA. <sup>h</sup> MEZERAY, FERRERAS. <sup>i</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Alonso X. ZURITA.

ther, attacked, and defeated him; and, having provided for the security of that country, returned into Arragon, where he found himself obliged by the union to call an assembly of the states at Saragossa <sup>k</sup>.

He is constrained to call an assembly of the states, and to make therein great concessions.

HE saw clearly, that he should be obliged to make many concessions; and therefore, the day before the states met, he privately made a protest, that whatever acts he did or signed in that assembly were null and void, as being against his opinion, and under compulsion. Fortified with this unkingly evasion he met the states, made them a long artful disingenuous speech, and heard very patiently all the disagreeable things they had to say; for without scruple they told him to his face, that his reign had been hitherto a continued series of breaches upon their constitution; that, by bestowing public employments upon bad men, he had made the people of Arragon pay the wages of those who laboured for their destruction; that, for the future therefore, he must think of governing by law; of removing these dangerous people from about his person; and of receiving his ministers, governors, and generals upon the recommendation of the states: which, if he hesitated to do, they would elect a new king. He seemed to take no offence at this, but contented himself with observing, that it was improper for persons in such an assembly to come armed; which he did in favour of his own partizans, who were afraid of declaring themselves upon that account: the assembly thereupon made an order, that for the future none should appear armed in their debates. The king, now secure of a party, came the next day, and falling upon his brother Don Jayme, in a set speech told him, he was an unnatural and perfidious rebel, and his associates traitors. The infant excused himself very modestly, hinted at the services he had done his country, which, he said, were overpaid by the honour they had done him in electing him head of the union; but some of the members who were near the door opened it, and exclaimed, that the king had violated the privileges of the states, and that it was doubtful whether their lives were secure. Upon which, a multitude of people armed burst in, and the king was indebted to his brother, and the chiefs of the malecontents, that he went away alive <sup>l</sup>.

Poisons his brother at Barcelo-

THE infant, and some of the principal nobility, attended him to Barcelona, where the queen was expected, and

<sup>k</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>l</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro X. ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

where, while they waited for her, an apoplexy was so com-
 plaisant as to remove Don Jayme; which has induced the historians of Arragon to assert, that it was of the king's procuring <sup>m.</sup> It did not however contribute much to his advantage, since, while his marriage was celebrating with pomp and magnificence at Barcelona, Don Ferdinand was making a great progress, by force of arms, in the kingdom
 of Valentia, and, from his success there, was declared also head of the union of Arragon; into which kingdom he sent
 his brother Don Juan to supply his place <sup>n.</sup> In Sardinia
 also most of the great families had rebelled; upon which the king sent Hugo Cervelon with a supply to his brother the
 viceroy, which proved fatal to them both; for engaging the
 malecontents precipitately, they were, together with the viceroy's son, and all the Arragonian cavalry, cut to pieces <sup>o.</sup>

na, and
 marries Donna Le-
 onora of Portugal.

THE next year was still more fruitful of great events; indeed, there have seldom happened, in the same compass of
 time, so many extraordinary transactions in any kingdom.
 The union of Valentia went on raising troops, and the union of Barcelona, according to the league that was between them, sent a considerable reinforcement, under the command of Don Ximenez de Urrea and Don Lope de Luna, which last
 was privately in the king's interest, and, by picking a quarrel
 with his associates, debauched the best part of the troops, and
 defeated the service <sup>p.</sup> However, the infant Don Ferdinand
 was so well beloved, and the cause was so popular in *Valen-
 tia*, that he suffered nothing by this accident, but found himself very soon at the head of fifty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The king Don Pedro, who was at Morviedro, with a very small party, being apprehensive of
 his safety, judged it expedient to fortify the place, which occasioned a general insurrection of its inhabitants, who intended to have put to death the king's chief counsellors and favourites, but that they secured themselves by a timely retreat,
 and left the king to take care of himself. He pacified the people, by assuring them, that he sought only his own preservation; upon which they judged it best for him and for them, to conduct him with the queen to Valentia, where they were received with great respect <sup>q.</sup> In the mean time,
 the king laboured to bring off his brother the infant Don Ferdinand, by proposing to declare him lieutenant general of

In great
 danger
 from the confederates, sti-
 led the union in Valentia.

A. D.
 1348.

<sup>m</sup> ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ.    <sup>n</sup> Chronica del Rey
 Don Pedro IV.    <sup>o</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA.    <sup>p</sup> Chronica del
 Rey Don Pedro IV.    <sup>q</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI
 BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.

his own dominions, and his successor, in case he died without issue male ; but the infant answered very firmly, that betraying the trust his country had reposed in him, was not the proper way to merit a crown<sup>1</sup>. Don Pedro then demanded of the king of Castile leave to levy some horse in his dominions, which, because it could not be decently refused, and was thought of no great consequence, was granted ; and accordingly Don Alvaro Garcia de Albornoz, who was related to Don Lope de Luna, raised, for Don Pedro's service, six hundred Castilian horse.

The confederates in Arragon entirely defeated, and Saragossa taken by Don Pedro.

By the ill conduct of the king's favourites, a sedition was excited in Valentia; the populace besieging the palace, and threatening Don Bernard de Cabrera, and Don Berenger de Arbella with death. The king, though a prince of great courage, was in much confusion ; but Don Pedro de Moncado advising him to go out with arms in his hand, and assuring him, that his presence would disperse the populace, he ventured upon that dangerous experiment, and, meeting with success, never apprehended any thing from popular tumults after<sup>2</sup>. His favourites, in the mean time, fled to Barcelona, and procuring an address from thence to the king, he followed them<sup>3</sup>. The union of Arragon being persuaded, that the king was assembling troops against them, solicited the infant Don Ferdinand to disperse them, which he very gallantly attempted ; but through the unexpected junction of Don Lope de Luna with his forces, and those commanded by Don Alvaro de Garcia Albornoz, the forces of the union were defeated, the infant wounded, and taken prisoner, but, as it fell out very luckily for him, by the Castilians, who treated him with great respect, and amongst whom his person was in safety<sup>4</sup>. Don Pedro declared Don Lope, count de Luna, the first subject in Arragon, who had this title, and upon this victory marched directly to Saragossa, where he declared null and void the concessions he had made to the union ; and, after having put the whole city in the utmost fear, executed thirteen of the principal persons in it ; and thus, by a single miscarriage, the union of Arragon was dissipated<sup>5</sup>.

A like fate attends the union in Valentia,

This scarce appeared any thing in the view of that high-spirited prince, since the union of Valentia still subsisted ; and, notwithstanding what had happened at Saragossa, made

<sup>1</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro IV. MARIANA. <sup>2</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, Chronica del Rey Don Pedro. <sup>3</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA. <sup>4</sup> RODERIC TOLETAN. de rebus Hispan. LUC. Tudens. Chron. <sup>5</sup> Chron. de Don Pedro IV,

no overtures of submission. The next point, therefore, was all things to subdue them; to which the king marched with his victo- being at rious army. The quarrel was decided by a battle, in which the king's the nobility of Arragon behaved very gallantly, and those of mercy. Valentia with all the fury that could be inspired by despair; so that, in the event they were rather butchered than beat: since nothing, but the loss of their troops, could have lost the battle; which left the best part of the kingdom, and the capital, wholly at the king's mercy *. In the first transport of his rage, he talked of giving it to the pillage of his soldiers, burning it to the ground, and sowing it with salt; but some of the lords that were about him moderated his passion, and hindered him from committing these excesses. However, he entered Valentia as a conqueror, sacrificed numbers of better men than himself to his ambition; and, as at Saragossa so here, he called for the roll of his concessions to the union, and destroyed it with his own hand †: forgetting, that the promises of a king are sacred, and that he becomes ipso facto a tyrant, who professes, that he borrows his authority from force. Don Alonso of Castile interceded with him in favour of his brother Don Ferdinand, and queen Leonora, offering to conclude a marriage between his son Don Henry, and one of the infantas of Arragon: Don Pedro answered, that the queen-dowager had intrigued, and Don Ferdinand fought against him; so that they had no favours to expect: but as the one had been his father's wife, and the other his father's son, they should peaceably enjoy what he had left them. In regard to the marriage, if he would restore him the kingdom of Murcia, and hold no correspondence with his malecontents, he was willing it should take effect ‡.

THE king had made Rimbao de Corbera viceroy of Sar- The inva- dinia, and he could not have confided that island to a per- son of son of greater courage or capacity. He quickly repaired Majorca the losses which his predecessors had sustained, and put by the de- things upon a right foot. But the Genoese having gained a throned great victory over the combined fleets of the emperor of Con- king, who stantinople, the king of Arragon, and the republic of Venice, is killed. and beginning to make a great naval armament, the viceroy fighting bravely came himself to Barcelona, to obtain a proportionable supply of ships and men, which the king his master readily furnished §. About the time he put to sea, in his return to Sar-

A. D.
1349.

* HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.
† Chron. de Don Pedro IV.    § Chronica del Rey Don Alonso XI.    • Chronica de Don Pedro IV.

dinia, there came intelligence, that the king of Majorca with his fleet and army was very likely to intercept him; upon which he debarked his forces in Majorca, where Don Jayme quickly after landed; and, upon Sunday the twenty-fifth of October, was defeated, or rather oppressed by numbers, and fighting courageously, refusing quarter, was slain <sup>b</sup>. His only son Jayme, after receiving a grievous wound in the face, was made prisoner, and carried by the admiral of Arragon, Don Pedro de Moncada, to his uncle, who received him graciously, and sent him to reside at Barcelona, ordering his father's body to be brought over, and buried in the cathedral church of Valentia <sup>c</sup>. The viceroy of Sardinia, after the defeat of the king of Majorca, re-imbarked his troops, and, upon his arrival in that island, settled every thing to the king's satisfaction.

Don Pedro causes the pope's legate to be hung up by the heels.

A. D.
1350.

1351.

HOWEVER, Don Pedro considering that it lay at a distance, and that whenever disturbances happened there, it gave him no small trouble, he signified to the malecontent lords, that if any thing could induce them to be quiet, he was inclined to do for them what they could desire; which, for the present, brought things into order <sup>d</sup>. The pope's legate Bernard Alanis, canon of the church of Valentia, having excommunicated some persons of high quality for not paying some ecclesiastical dues, the king commanded him to absolve them, and, upon his refusal, sent both him and his father to prison; which having no effect upon the legate, he ordered a gibbet to be erected upon the castle wall, and the legate to be hung up there by the feet, with an assurance, that if he did not do what the king directed, the rope should be cut, and he left to tumble down the rocks; but the canon having hung some time desired to be taken down, and did as the king desired <sup>e</sup>. The pope, as it might be well expected, took fire at this, and threatened the monarch of Arragon with all the thunder of the church; but the pope being poor, and the king rich and great, an embassy to Avignon, and a few good words, pacified all <sup>f</sup>. On the twenty-seventh of December, Donna Leonora, queen of Arragon, was brought to bed of the infant Don Juan, to whom at his birth the king gave the title of duke of Gironne; which, in succeeding times, became the title of course of the eldest sons of the kings of Arragon <sup>g</sup>. He renewed likewise his alliance with Don Pedro the cruel of Castile, and terminated, by a treaty with the crown of France, all points in difference about the territories formerly belonging to the king of Majorca <sup>b</sup>. He likewise, concluded a new treaty with the Vene- A. D.

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.      <sup>c</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA.      <sup>d</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV.      <sup>e</sup> ZURITA, A-BARCA.      <sup>f</sup> RAINALD, MAYERNE TURQUET.      <sup>g</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV.

tians against the Genoese, and, the civil war being again 1352.
 broke out in Sardinia, he sent a stout fleet to the assistance of his subjects, and of his allies.

THAT war becoming daily more serious, the king went His fleet,
 into Catalonia, to hold an assembly of the states, where he in conjunc-
 demanded a very large supply, which was granted him, and tion with having, in return, appointed Don Bernard de Cabrera, at the Vene-
 the request of the states, general and commander in chief, tian, dehe, to oblige them the more, gave him the county of Bas <sup>c</sup>. feats the
 At the time of the arrival of the count, Don Bernard the naval viceroy was employed in the siege of Algieri; to succour force of which place, the Genoese sent a fleet of five large men of Genoa.
 war, and fifty gallies, under the command of Antonio Gri- maldi, one of the best officers in their service. Upon this,
 the count Don Bernard quitted the siege, and, with the Ve- netian admiral Nicolo Pisano, who brought with him twenty gallies, went to offer the enemy battle. The Genoese, proud of their former naval victory, did not decline it, and on the
 twenty-seventh of August the fleets engaged with great fury
 and obstinacy on both sides. Some say, that the Venetian
 and Catalonian gallies were not only intermixed but chained
 together; however that might be, there is nothing more
 certain than that this was one of the hardest fought battles
 in those times; but, in the end, the confederates gained a complete victory, the Genoese losing no less than eight thousand men, amongst whom were many of their principal nobility, thirty-three gallies, and three thousand two hundred
 prisoners; on the part of the Catalans, three hundred and fifty men were killed, and two thousand wounded <sup>d</sup>. After this glorious success, Don Bernard returned to the siege of Algieri, which, having no farther succours to expect, surrendered upon terms, all the malecontents being allowed to march out, except Fabian Doria, whose head was struck off
 the next day <sup>e</sup>.

THE Genoese were under such a consternation at this de- Resolves to feat, that they submitted themselves to the duke of Milan; go in per-
 and, being very desirous to keep the war at a distance, partly son to put

<sup>a</sup> Chronica del Rey Don Pedro de Pedro Lopez de Ayala, ME-
 ZERAY, ZURITA. <sup>b</sup> Chronica de Don Pedro IV. <sup>c</sup> ZU-
 RITA, ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, FERRE-
 RAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>d</sup> ZURITA.

mer reign <sup>k</sup>. By which some think, he scarce did more than repair the injuries done him in his own.

His court
disting-guished by cultivating music, dancing,
poetry, and other diversions.

THE famous John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, upon his return from that expedition, of which we have given a large account in a former section, thought he had some reason to take offence at the conduct of the king of Arragon; he sent therefore the archbishop of Bordeaux to demand a sum of money from that prince as an equivalent for not furnishing him with a certain number of horse every campaign, as by his treaty with the crown of England he was bound to do. The king answered, that the troops were always ready; and, as they were never demanded, he did not think himself obliged to pay any such sum of money: the prelate, however, replied in such rude terms, that the king caused him to be arrested; upon which, the duke his master ravaged the territories of Arragon, but, in a little time, these differences were appeased <sup>l</sup>. The emperor Wenceslaus sent an ambassador to compliment Don Juan upon his accession, who received this testimony of the emperor's respect with great kindness <sup>m</sup>. In Sardinia, he granted all the estates of her father to Donna Leonora de Arborea, which restored peace in that island, and procured the new viceroy, Don Simon Perez de Arenas, a quiet administration <sup>n</sup>. At this time there was a schism in the church; but the king was prevailed upon to acknowledge pope Clement the seventh, who resided at Avignon, and thither he went to do him homage for the island of Sardinia <sup>o</sup>. The character of Don Juan was certainly that of a mild and merciful prince, but he was too uxorious, and the queen Donna Violante much too fond of pleasures; her favourite Donna Carazza Villaragut had, for that age, a very refined taste in poetry and music, and she was so delighted with works composed in a mixed kind of language, which in Arragon they called Gaya, and, according to Mariana's interpretation, was no other than the dialect called in France Limosine, that she prevailed upon the king and queen not only to entertain poets who excelled therein, but to erect schools and academies for the improvement of this kind of poetry. The nobility of Arragon were so little pleased with the new turn taken at court, that they expostulated very roughly with the king, and were even on the point of taking up arms. The queen and Donna Ca-

A. D.
1388.

<sup>k</sup> ZURITA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

BARNES'S History of Edward III. FERRERAS.

ANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>o</sup> RAINALD, MARIANA.

<sup>l</sup> ABARCA,

<sup>m</sup> MARI-

<sup>n</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.

razza had also their party. However, in an assembly of the states, held at Monçon, that lady was banished, and these new-fashioned foreign diversions were prohibited under very severe penalties<sup>p</sup>; neither did these disturbances break out any more.

THE count de Armagnac sent his brother count Ber-<sup>The count</sup>
nard, with a great body of troops, to make an irrup-<sup>de Ar-</sup> tion into Catalonia. The Spanish historians say, that they <sup>magnac</sup> were English, French, Flemings, and, in short, a mix-<sup>sets up a</sup> ture of all nations; and that the cause of this irrup-<sup>claim to</sup> tion was a mere appetite to plunder: but from other hi-<sup>the domi-</sup> storians we learn it was not so. The count de Armagnac <sup>nions of</sup> pretended a right to the dominions of the crown of Ma-<sup>the crown</sup>
orca, and it was in support of this claim that his brother, <sup>of Ma-</sup> at the head of all the soldiers of fortune he could collect, <sup>jorca.</sup> made this incursion in the midst of winter<sup>q</sup>. In the spring he besieged Besalu, the garrison of which made an obstinate defence, and Don Bernard de Cabrera, having defeated part of the French forces, when the king marched with a numerous army to fight the rest, Don Bernard de Armagnac thought it expedient to retire, rather than run the hazard of a battle<sup>r</sup>. The king, at the beginning of his reign, had created his brother Don Martin, duke of Mont- alban, and his son was entitled Don Martin de Jerica, from the lordship of that name<sup>s</sup>. The great point in view of both brothers was, that of marrying this young prince last mentioned to Donna Maria, queen of Sicily, their niece;
and having with much difficulty obtained a dispensation from pope Clement the seventh, dated in the month of No- vember, it is presumed, that they were married towards the close of the year; at least it is certain, that, in the beginning of the next, a fleet of one hundred sail, and a considerable body of land forces was assembled, on the coast of Ca- talonia, under the command of Don Bernard de Cabrera, with whom embarked the duke of Montalban, and his son and daughter, the king and queen of Sicily, for that island<sup>t</sup>.
This expedition was attended with success, and that with severity towards those who opposed these princes; but the history of this war belongs to another place. As new troubles were broke out in Sardinia,<sup>u</sup> the king of Arragon intended to have gone thither with a royal fleet and army;
but the apprehension of the kingdom of Valentia's being

A. D.
1389:A. D.
1390.

1391.

<sup>p</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>q</sup> MA-RIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>r</sup> ZURITA, MAYERNE TURQUET.
<sup>s</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS.

invaded by the Moors, prevented his leaving his dominions, and obliged him to content himself with sending thither a numerous reinforcement, with a strong squadron <sup>1</sup>. This year, the infanta Donna Violante was married to Lewis, duke of Anjou, and the infanta Donna Joanna to Matthew, count of Feix, the former being the king's daughter by the reigning queen, as the latter was by his former consort <sup>2</sup>. To strengthen the present harmony subsisting between the two crowns, and to prevent disputes on that head, the limits between the kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon were settled by the express command and conjunct authority of both princes <sup>3</sup>. A precaution which had afterwards a very good effect.

Death of Don Juan,
which occasions
great confusions in
the kingdom of Arragon.

THE next year, the king renewed his preparations for passing into Sardinia, where things were in greater confusion than ever; but either want of money, or his own indolence, hindered him a second time, though he knew that his brother, his nephew, and his niece, were besieged in the fortress of Catanea, by the malecontents of Sicily, and he had given them the strongest assurances that, as soon as the affairs of Sardinia were redressed, he would infallibly come to their assistance <sup>4</sup>. But Don Bernard de Cabrera, considering that his family had been raised by the crown, mortgaged all his lands for a large sum of money, and therewith equipped a strong squadron; by the timely arrival of which under his command, their Sicilian majesties were saved from imprisonment at least, if not from death <sup>5</sup>. Upon the decease of pope Clement the seventh, the cardinals of his faction at Avignon elected the famous Peter de Luna, of one of the noblest families in Arragon, who assumed the name of Benedict the thirteenth, and gave immediate notice of his accession to the papal throne to all Christian princes, and more especially to the kings of Castile and Arragon <sup>6</sup>. The concerns of Don Juan continued in great disorder, the count de Armagnac continuing to make incursions into Roussillon; to which he pretended a right, the troubles in Sardinia increasing, and the war in Sicily being still kept on foot <sup>7</sup>. The king, who was a mild and good-natured prince, easily persuaded into wrong measures, but withal as easily set right, and who is celebrated by the historians of Arragon

A. D.
1393.

1394.

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>2</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA. <sup>3</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>4</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>5</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>6</sup> RAINALD, BALUZ, ZURITA. <sup>7</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

for a quality not common in kings, hearing reproofs patiently, and esteeming and preferring those from whom they came, left public affairs, in a great measure, to the queen Donna Violante, a princess of great spirit, and much given to intrigue; while he chiefly amused himself with the pleasures of the table, the conversation of his nobility, and the sports of the field. As he was hunting, he unluckily fell from his horse, frightened, as some writers say, by the sudden appearance of a monstrous she-wolf, of which fall he died, on the nineteenth of May, one thousand three hundred ninety-five, in the ninth year of his reign, and the forty-fifth of his life, leaving behind him two daughters married to two French princes, as we have before mentioned. His brother the duke of Montalban being at this time in Sicily <sup>b</sup>.

THE sudden and unexpected death of the king occasioned The success- great consternation and trouble; the queen-dowager Donna Violante, probably with a view of gaining the regency, gave the spirit out, that she was with child. Matthew, count of Foix, to Don claimed the crown for his wife, the eldest daughter of the Martin, deceased monarch, but Donna Maria du Luna, dutchess of Montal- ban, asserted the rights of her husband with equal by spirit and success; and, in the month of July, the states of and ad- Arragon, Valentia, and Catalonia declared Don Martin, pursuant to the testimony of the deceased king, the sole heir dress of of his dominions, and confirmed the queen in the exercise his con- of the administration <sup>c</sup>. She made no scruple of putting guards upon the dowager to prevent any imposture, and withdrew them immediately upon that princess's declaring she was not with child <sup>d</sup>. She granted safe conducts to the ministers sent by the count de Foix to the states of Arragon and Catalonia, and granted that prince a copy of the clause relating to the succession in Don Juan's will. She took equal pains to avoid a war by a negotiation, and to provide for it, if it was not to be avoided, which fell out to be the case. The count and countess de Foix passed the Pyrenees, and fell with a considerable body of troops into the territories of Arragon, assuming the title of king and queen, and made themselves master of the town of Balbastro, notwithstanding a very gallant resistance, and flattered themselves with the hopes of becoming possessors of that kingdom by force of arms. They were quickly convinced of their error by the steady defence of the citadel of Balbastro, into which the

<sup>b</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>c</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>d</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA.

A. D. principal persons, amongst those who had defended the town, 1395. retired. Their army quickly found themselves invaded by famine; they no sooner sent parties on any side, in order to obtain a supply of provisions, than they were surrounded,
and cut to pieces. At length, having no other resource, they retired into Navarre, so miserably harrassed in their retreat, that their army was become little more than an escorte <sup>e</sup>.

Don Martin settles
his son's affairs in Sicily,
and makes a tour to Avignon
before his return.

THE king Don Martin received the news of his accession,
and a considerable reinforcement of troops by a strong squadron, which the queen had dispatched <sup>f</sup>. He did not, however, immediately embark for his hereditary dominions, but employed some time in settling the affairs of his son; in order to which, the very report of his being become king of Arragon did not a little contribute. This, however, took up so many months, that it was the middle of December in the next year before he was ready to embark. He judged it convenient, however, to take Sardinia in his way, where he settled every thing to the people's satisfaction, and provided with very strong garrisons some places that had been conquered in the island of Corfica. He then proceeded to the coasts of France, and, landing in Provence, went to Avignon to confer with pope Benedict, to whom he did homage for the kingdoms of Sardinia and Corfica. Having regulated several points of consequence with him, he reembarked on board his squadron, and continued his voyage to Barcelona, where he arrived on the twenty-sixth of June <sup>g</sup>. On

A. D. the twenty-eighth, he declared the count and countess of 1397. Foix traitors, and confiscated all their estates. He went afterwards to Saragossa, confirmed all the rights and liberties of the people, and, before the close of the year, sent powerful succours both to Sardinia and Sicily <sup>h</sup>.

Caresse
the states
in such a manner as to draw from them
larger supplies than any of his predecessors.

IN the month of April, in the succeeding year, he held an assembly of the states at Saragossa, in which he expressed his gratitude for their zeal and duty in his absence, and expatiated on this subject in so happy a manner, that they assured him he had nothing to do, but to acquaint them with any thing that might be still wanting to the prosperity of his affairs, and he should find they would act with the same spirit. He then desired they would acknowledge his son, the king of Sicily, for his successor, upon condition

<sup>e</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>f</sup> Indices
Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum, FERRERAS. <sup>g</sup> RAI-NALD, BALUZ, ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>h</sup> FERRE-RAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

that kingdom should be annexed to the crown of Arragon; to which they consented: they, likewise, granted him the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand crowns to pay his debts, and an annual revenue of thirty thousand crowns in the nature of a civil list <sup>1</sup>. The count de Foix made a new attempt, in the autumn, to penetrate into Arragon, but without effect; and deceased, not long after, without issue <sup>2</sup>. The corsairs of Barbary; having disturbed the commerce of his subjects, Don Martin fitted out a strong fleet to chastise them, and afterwards sent a squadron to the assistance of pope Benedict; which, however, being harrassed by contrary winds, returned without performing any thing. In the mean time, pope Boniface, provoked by his attachment to his competitor, bestowed the kingdoms of Sardinia and Sicily on Don Artal de Alagon, count de Molineto, provided he could find any way to get possession <sup>3</sup>. A conduct in the court of Rome, which, however agreeable to Italian policy, is clearly inconsistent with the principles of the gospel.

A. D.
1398.

Don Martin, in the ensuing spring, prevailed upon the French to raise the siege of Avignon, upon a promise, that Benedict should renounce his right to the papacy, if his competitor would do so too <sup>4</sup>. On the thirteenth of April, the king was solemnly crowned in the cathedral of Saragossa, and, on the twentieth of the same month, the feast of St. George, the patron of the kingdom, the queen was also crowned with like pomp and splendour <sup>5</sup>. Archambaud de de Foix, Grailli, who had succeeded the count de Foix by marrying his sister, offered to renounce his pretensions to the crown of Arragon for a small county, which the king granted him with very good will <sup>6</sup>. He sent, the same year, a fleet of seventy sail to the assistance of his son in Sicily, who, by the help of these timely succours, put an end to all the troubles in that island <sup>7</sup>. The duke of Anjou, having demanded Donna Violante, the king's niece, with her fortune of one hundred and sixty thousand crowns, the king sent both that and the princess, upon her renouncing all title to the succession <sup>8</sup>. The next year was fatal to the royal family in

Wisely
compro- mises the dispute
with the
representative of the count
de Foix,

A. D.
1400.

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>2</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>3</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>4</sup> RAINALD, ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>5</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>6</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>7</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>8</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

- A. D. Sicily, where, early in the spring, Don Pedro, the only son 1401. of their majesties, deceased<sup>1</sup>; and, on the twenty-seventh of May following, his mother Donna Maria, who by her will bequeathed the kingdom to her husband, who was also the heir by descent<sup>2</sup>. As he was in the flower of his age, many marriages were proposed for him; but, by the advice 1402. of the king his father, he preferred the infanta Donna
Blanca of Navarre, and that princess was sent to him, on board a fleet commanded by Don Bernard de Cabrera, in the month of September following, where she was received with all possible demonstrations of joy and affection<sup>3</sup>. But he still continued in the pursuit of irregular pleasures.

The king's unexpected death without heirs occasions an in-terriguum.
 DONNA Joanna, the king's niece, widow of the count
de Foix, who had formerly given him so much trouble, was exceedingly desirous of passing the rest of her days in her own country, and, upon her signifying this to Don Martin,
 he very readily assented, assigned her the palace of Valentia, and a revenue of three thousand crowns<sup>4</sup> a year. He endeavoured by the like acts of condescension to pacify the troubles in Sardinia, where the nobility were continually caballing against each other, and altogether against the royal authority; and the case was very much the same in the kingdom of Arragon, where, tho' all the lords professed great duty for the king, and really shewed it, yet, from an affectation of power and independency, they were continually embarked in factions and quarrels against each other<sup>5</sup>.
 The young king of Sicily, giving too much ear to some bad counsellors, the king his father sent for him, and he came accordingly to Barcelona; but could not be prevailed on to remain long there, alleging, that his own dominions would suffer greatly by his absence, and, therefore, in the autumn of the same year, he returned to Sicily<sup>6</sup>. The next was fatal to the old queen-dowager Donna Sybilla, and to the queen consort Donna Maria, whose death was equally lamented by the king her husband, and by his subjects<sup>7</sup>.
 The factions in Valentia were now become to the full as troublesome as those in the kingdom of Arragon; in consequence of which, Don Raymond Boyle, governor of the capital, was assassinated coming out of his palace, which murder the king caused to be enquired into so closely, that

<sup>1</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ gestarum.      <sup>2</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS.      <sup>3</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA.      <sup>4</sup> ZURITA, MA-RIANA.      <sup>5</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.
<sup>6</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA.      <sup>7</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum.

most of those, who were any way concerned in it, came to be discovered, and, as they deserved, put to death; his brother, who was not altogether innocent, escaped with the loss of his right hand <sup>a</sup>. The island of Sicily, being torn with civil dissensions, and the lords, in the king of Arragon's interest, having signified the distress they were in to the king of Sicily, he immediately determined to go to their relief. He did so; and, not long after his arrival, he gained a glorious victory, which might have restored that country's quiet, if the victor had not been vanquished by his passion: for, being extremely captivated with a young woman, whom he saw there, he abandoned himself, in such a manner, to his lust, that, being seized with a fever, he died on the twenty-seventh of June <sup>a</sup>. The king his father, who was now become his heir, finding that great troubles were like to arise in his dominions about the succession, endeavoured to prevent it by marrying; and, accordingly espoused Donna Margaretta de Prades, who was of the royal house of Castile: and this is supposed to have hastened his death, which happened on the last of May, one thousand four hundred and ten <sup>b</sup>, when he had just entered the sixteenth year of his reign.

A. D.
1407.

WE are now arrived at an interregnum; for, upon the demise of this prince, the states assumed the supreme authority in the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia, and in the principality of Catalonia, till it should be determined by them to whom the crown of right belonged. It is to be observed, that notwithstanding they were united under one sovereign, yet these three states remained perfectly independent, and to these were now added the kingdoms of Majorca, Sardinia, and Sicily. There had been many competitors for the succession in the life of Don Martin, which put him under great difficulties. Amongst these, the count of Urgel was the most troublesome, and therefore he twice appointed him vicar-general of his dominions; which was very satisfactory to the count, who judged, that it made him known to the people, in the light of presumptive heir: the king saw it in the same light, but had quite another meaning; for he knew that the nobility of Arragon would consider it as an invasion of their privileges, and impute it not at all to his judgment, but to the count's ambition, in which he was not at all disappointed. The true scheme of the king was, in case he had no children by his last wife, to settle the crown on his grandson Don Frederic, the natural son of the king of Sicily. Which project of his he could never bring in any degree to bear; for the lawyers opposed it unanimously as inconsistent with the constitution, injurious to the remains of the royal family, and prejudicial to the people. The lawyers had a great ascendancy in this country, and were superstitiously devoted to their ancient form of government; of which, as it could not be any where else so properly introduced, we will speak clearly and succinctly here.

The disputes about the succession, began in the days of Don Martin, revived on his decease.

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA. <sup>a</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS. <sup>b</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCHÉ, ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

Some account of the original constitution in the monarchy of Arragon.

THOSE who take the antiquity of the kingdom of Arragon higher than we have done, say, that when the people, upon the subversion of the Gothic monarchy, made choice of a prince to lead them against the Moors, they made an express capitulation with him, that he should govern according to their laws, and should not invade their liberties; of which they were jealous to an extreme degree. But if this be true, in any sense, it must, as we shall hereafter shew, be true of the old kings of Navarre. It is, however, infinitely more probable, that the remains of the Goths, in general throughout Spain, adhered as strictly to the old principles of their policy in the state, as they did to the doctrine and discipline of their church. That the latter was sooner changed than the former, was owing to the artful incroachments of the pope, whose authority, when it was once owned, was not easily to be resisted. But in the state, all the greater and the lesser nobility, that is to say, all who had any property, had so strong an interest in the preservation of their privileges, that it was much less easy to cancel or even to change them. Besides, Arragon, being an inland kingdom, property underwent little alteration, and families, so long as they subsisted, preserved their estates. But be this as it will, it is beyond all question, that the monarchs of Arragon were very limited monarchs, and that the constitution, during the reigns of those princes, whose history we have written, was very little impaired. Let us now see what that constitution was. We have very ample materials; the substance of which we will represent as briefly as we can.

Their kings, tho' not elected, were always confirmed by the people, and sworn to the laws.

THE men of property, those who had estates, which, generally speaking, they had acquired by their swords, were stiled originally, and in general, Los Ricos Hombres, that is literally, rich men; but may be more sensibly translated, men of estates, or, men of property; that is, as the lawyers of this country express themselves in plain terms, barons; for they say, that whatever titles of honour were afterwards afterwards introduced, as flowing from the king's will and pleasure, yet the right of sitting amongst the states did not arise from their being dukes, marquisses, or counts, but was inherent to them as barons; and they give us a list of eleven or twelve old families, who were the original Ricos Hombres, or barons of Arragon. In process of time, they came to be distinguished into the greater and lesser nobility. The former were those, who, by the favour of the crown, were advanced to superior titles of honour; the latter such as retained only their ancient dignity: the prelates likewise sat in that assembly, and the deputies from the great cities. In this assembly of states, laws were made for the government of the whole realm, and to see those laws put in execution, and to prevent any subject, of what rank soever, from being denied the benefit of them, against the oppression of any other subject, or even of the king himself, they had a magistrate, who was the head of justice, whom they stiled, El Justicia de Arragon, or chief justice of Arragon, to whom appeals might be made from the king; who might controul the king if he acted against the law, and who was not accountable, for any thing he did in the discharge of his office, to the king, but to the states.

THE historians of Arragon affirm, and there is good High office reason to believe, that this office was as ancient as their of chief monarchy; but, however, the history of these chief ju-justice of stices, which is very copiously and distinctly written, rises Arragon no higher than to the taking of Saragossa from the Moors. defined and It is said, that, at the inauguration of their kings, the chief described. justice sat on a high tribunal in his robes, with his head covered; the king then came before him, and kneeling down bareheaded swore to maintain their privileges, and to govern according to law. Upon which proclamation was made, on the part of the assembly, in these words: Nos que valemos tanto como vos os hazemos nuestro Rey y Señor con tal que guardéis nuestros fueros y libertades, si no, no: We, who are as good as you, have taken you for our king and lord, so long as you respect our laws and liberties, and no longer. It is said, that the king Don Pedro the first, by great art and management, and by the promise of other privileges less dishonourable to the crown, and as advantageous to the people, procured this form to be abolished by the states; and, it is added, that having the parchment in one of his hands, which contained the law, he drew his dagger, and wounding the hand, in which he held it, suffered the blood to stream over it, adding these words: Ley de poder elegir Rey los Vassallos sangre de Rey avia de costar. A law that gives vassals

vassals a power to elect their king, ought to be effaced with a king's blood : from whence he was surnamed Don Pedro el Pugal, or Peter with the dagger ; and as a sufficient evidence of the truth of this, they shew his statue with the dagger in one hand, and the parchment in the other, in the Casa de la Deputation, or house of commons at Barcelona.

*A common mistake on this subject stated
and recti-fied.*

THIS, though written by very grave authors, and taken upon trust by strangers, has very much the air of a fable ; and so indeed it is, but not without a ground of truth. The king was not Don Pedro the first, but Don Pedro the fourth, surnamed the ceremonious ; and the law was not of election, but that for establishing the union, which he cancelled in an assembly of the states, by cutting it in pieces with his dagger : in doing which, he struck his finger by accident, and when he saw the blood run, he said to the states : A law, that has occasioned so much bloodshed, is happily wiped out of your statutes by the blood of a king. It is however certain, that though Arragon never was an elective kingdom, yet the confirmation of the states to the next heir's title was held so necessary, that it was very ill taken, if he either did any regal act, or even assumed the title before he had sworn to preserve their privileges : and, in consequence of that oath, was recognized and acknowledged for their sovereign by the states. They likewise took upon themselves to examine and decide when any disputes arose, in relation to the succession, as we shall see at large in another section ; but, at present, it is requisite to give the reader, as we have undertaken, the histories of all the monarchies in Spain ; that of Majorca, under the few kings that it had, in which the reader will find various circumstances worthy of his notice, and which do not occur in any of the accounts published in our history.

S E C T. XI.

The History of the Kingdom of Majorca, from the time of its being conquered by James I. of Arragon, to its Re-union, or rather second Conquest by Don Pedro IV. after which it remained annexed to that Crown.

THE possession of the island of Majorca, and of those The conquest of the Balears is projected many years before it was accomplished. that depended upon it, was an object, which those who were masters of the continent of Spain had ever in view, and sooner or later atchieved it. The Moors, as the reader will see in another place, made themselves masters of them, and lost them again; but, pursuing their designs some time after, they had better fortune, and had been actually sovereigns here upwards of four centuries, when Don Jayme of Arragon formed the design of augmenting his own dominions, by the junction of these islands <sup>a</sup>. It must not, however, be understood, that, in all this space of time, they had received no interruption; for the contrary is true. Several of the counts of Barcelona, provoked, in some measure, by the depredations committed on their coasts by the Majorcan Moors, who had a natural turn to piracy, but chiefly out of a desire to make conquests, or, at least, reprizals by descents of a like nature, had given them a great deal of trouble, ruined some of their best towns upon the coast, and enriched themselves and their troops by the plunder <sup>b</sup>. But, as in most of these expeditions, they were indebted to the Pisans, the Genoese, or some other of the Italian states, for the best part of the naval force that was employed in them, we thought it expedient, as well to avoid swelling this part of our work, as to prevent repetitions, to refer those expeditions, till, in the natural course of our undertaking, we shall come to treat of the history of these maritime states <sup>c</sup>. Here, therefore, the reader is to expect only what regards the royal house of Arragon. Some historians have suggested, that when Don Pedro the second went into Italy, and was crowned by the pope, one great motive of his voyage was to negotiate a league with some of the republics before-mentioned, in order to facilitate a design he had formed of invading and reducing these islands<sup>a</sup>; but, as we have shewn in the history of his reign, he quickly found himself so much embarrassed, with a variety of troublesome affairs that he had upon his hands, that he left his project to be accomplished by some of his successors, under a probable expectation they would see the facility and expediency of this conquest for the security of the rest of their territories.

<sup>a</sup> Historia general del Reyno Balearico por JUAN DAMETO.

<sup>b</sup> FRANCISCO DIAGO Historia de los antiquos Contes de Barcelona. Barcelona 1603. fo. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>c</sup> See the respective Histories of the Republicks of Pisa, Lucca, and Genoa.

Majorca,
or Mallorca, is much better condition than it was or now.

As a sufficient account of these islands have been given in other parts of this work, a particular description will not be expected of them here; and yet there are some things that, for the better understanding of the history, it is absolutely necessary to take notice of. These islands, but more especially Majorca, or, as the Spaniards write it, Mallorca, was in a far different condition from what it has been since*. All writers agree, that there is hardly any country more indebted to nature; for though one part of it be mountainous, and consequently not very fertile, yet the greater part of it is flat, and of so excellent a soil, that it produces prodigious quantities of corn, as good in its kind as any in Europe; oil, wine, and salt in vast abundance; cattle and sheep sufficient for the inhabitants: but deer, rabbits, and wild fowl in such plenty, as might alone have furnished their subsistence<sup>f</sup>. The air is very pure and temperate, and by its situation the heat in summer is so qualified by the breezes, that it is not only the largest and most plentiful, but by much the pleasantest of all the islands<sup>g</sup>. These and other advantages were, at this juncture, improved to the utmost; for the Moors, ever industrious and indefatigable, and withal wonderfully populous, surrounded the whole coast with fortifications, that is, with a kind of towers, and lines between them; cultivated every spot that was not either rock or sand; carried on a great trade with their countrymen in Spain and Africa, and had no less than fifteen great towns, whereas there are not now above three<sup>h</sup>; neither was it at all difficult for the Moorish sovereign to bring into the field an army much superior in number to the inhabitants that are now upon it, taking in all ranks, sexes, and ages. In a word, at this time the king of Majorca was very powerful, and his subjects rich and happy, through the exercise of trade with their own countrymen, and piracy upon the Christians <sup>i</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Historia general del Reyno Balearico, por JUAN DAMETO.

<sup>b</sup> DRAGO, ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>f</sup> DAMETO, COLMENARES Abbe d'VAYRAC. <sup>g</sup> DAMETO, DU BOIS, COLMENARES.

<sup>h</sup> DAMETO, ZURITA, MARIANA.

WE need not wonder that, in circumstances like these, A very slight cause both prince and people were less prudent than if they had been in a worse situation. They had, upon some slight pre-<sup>occasions</sup> tences, taken two vessels belonging to Barcelona, one of which was very richly laden. Of this, the people of that city complained to their king Don Jayme, who was at that time but a very young man, much perplexed in his affairs, and who, in all probability, had never thought of attacking these islands; at least nothing of this kind appears from his conduct; for, upon this complaint, he sent an ambassador to the king of Majorca to demand satisfaction, which might have been easily given; for the Catalans were in reality the aggressors, and had taken a tartane of Majorca, though of no great value <sup>k</sup>. But very unfortunately for the Moorish prince, he enquired of a Genoese master of a ship, what strength the king of Arragon had; who answered, that he was a poor pitiful prince, who, with the whole force of his dominions, was not able to take the castle of Peniscola <sup>l</sup>. When the ambassador had his audience, the Moorish king put on an affected ignorance, and asked him, who his master was? My master, answered the ambassador, is Don Jayme, king of Arragon, the son of Don Pedro, who, at the memorable battle of Tolosa, cut many thousands of your nation to pieces <sup>m</sup>. This unexpected answer so ruffled the Moor, that he was on the point of seizing him who gave it; and though upon reflection he did not do that, yet he answered him with contempt, and ordered him to quit his dominions without delay. A conduct inexcusable in itself, and of which he had quickly cause to repent <sup>n</sup>.

AT his return, the ambassador found his master at Bar- Don Jayme I. celona, to whom he gave a very particular account of the reception he had met with, which so irritated Don Jayme, that he swore, at the altar, never to desist from his enterprize against Majorca, till he had the king by the beard, that is, till he had his enemies at his mercy. There is however great probability, that there was a mixture of policy with his resentment. He was desirous of being at the head of an army entirely under his own command, and of accustoming his nobility to obey him; his cousin Don Nugno Sanchez was very desirous of having the command given to himself, but the king would not hear of it<sup>o</sup>. The nobility of Arragon, and even the pope's legate, advised him to turn his arms rather against Valentia, but he was determined. The nobles of Catalonia furnished him with all he could desire: and in what condition they were able to do this, will appear from the quota furnished by the archbishop of Tarragona; which was, a thousand marks in gold, five hundred quarters of wheat, one hundred men at arms, and one thousand foot, to be paid by him till the conquest of the island<sup>p</sup>. His whole force consisted of fifteen hundred horse, and about fifteen thousand foot, of whom about a thousand were mere adventurers from France, Provence, Gascony, &c. He put to sea on Wednesday the first of September, and, after two or three storms, came upon the coasts of Majorca, where the Moors opposed his landing, which was not effected without much trouble and some loss; at length, however, his whole army was debarked, and a resolution taken to give the enemy battle: in which the soldiers were so eager, that they would have marched without their officers<sup>q</sup>, who only laboured to restrain them till they were recovered a little from their fatigues: however their impetuosity prevailed.

<sup>i</sup> COLMENARES, DU BOIS, Abbe d'VAYRAC. <sup>k</sup> DAMETO, ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>l</sup> Historia de Cataluna, por BERN. DESCLOT. <sup>m</sup> Historia general del Reyno Balearico. ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>n</sup> DAMETO, MARIANA, ABARCA.

A. D.
1229.

The king
of Majorca and his subjects
absolutely reduced within four months.

THE Moorish king lay with an army of five thousand horse, and thirty-seven thousand foot, in the best position he could take for covering his capital; Don Jayme attacked him with such fury, and his troops, who were all old soldiers, and accustomed to the field, were so much superior to the Moors, that, notwithstanding their superiority in point of numbers, they were quickly routed, and so totally, that the king had much ado to collect eight thousand men, nor could he do this till the city of Majorca was invested, into which he got with his forces by a stratagem<sup>r</sup>. While Don Jayme remained before the place, several of the Moorish lords submitted to him; so that he was master of a great part of the island before the city was reduced<sup>s</sup>. At length, the Moorish king offered to pay the expences of the war; and that being rejected, he proposed to surrender the place, and to pay a certain sum of money for every head, to preserve them from being put to death, which the king would have accepted, but the army refused, and demanded to be led to the assault. The Moors, absolutely desperate, defended themselves with great obstinacy, and some of the lords proposed to the king renewing the negociation; which Don Jayme refused, adding, it is too late to be wise, now we must conquer or die. At length, however, the place was taken <sup>1</sup>. The Moorish king endeavoured to conceal himself, but was taken, and presented to Don Jayme, as was soon after his son, a youth of thirteen years old. The king of Arragon, in discharge of his oath, took his enemy by the beard, but spoke to him kindly, and promised him good usage; as for the son, he was instructed in the Christian religion, baptized by the name of Don Jayme, and the king gave him a very large estate in Valentia, where his posterity were still remaining in the days of Mariana <sup>2</sup>. The city was taken, and the island of Majorca consequently reduced, on the last day of the year; so that this expedition was executed in about four months, and the king enabled to comply with the promises he had made to his nobility, and to those of other nations, who, under the specious pretences of religion and honour, were in reality cutting out settlements for themselves with their swords <sup>3</sup>.

<sup>o</sup> Historia de Cataluna, por BERN. DESCLOT. ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>p</sup> Historia general del Reyno Balearico. ZURITA, MARIANA. <sup>q</sup> DAMETO, ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>r</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. ABARCA, Abbe VAYSSAC. <sup>s</sup> DAMETO, ZURITA, MARIANA.

It was some years before the Moors were brought thoroughly into subjection; for, having a natural abhorrence to their new masters, as Catalans as well as Christians, they were perpetually taking up arms; and when they could no longer keep the field, they sheltered themselves in the natural fortresses of the island, that is, vast caves in the sides of high mountains, the entrances of which were easily defended, and the room within was so great as to admit many families without any considerable inconvenience <sup>4</sup>. By degrees however they were brought under, but it is judged that, by the slaughter during the war, and these insurrections, and the numbers that quitted their country, and retired into the kingdom of Granada, or to Barbary, this island lost one half of her inhabitants. The king, Don Jayme, however, greatly augmented and adorned the city of Majorca, or Palma, which, at the time it fell into his hands, was built chiefly on the sea coast, and on the side of the mountain;

Citadel of Majorca demolished, and a cathedral and palace erected in its room.

<sup>1</sup> Historia general del Rey Balearico. ABARCA, FERRERAS.

<sup>2</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. Historia general de Espana lib. xvi. MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>3</sup> DAMETO, ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>4</sup> DAMETO, ZURITA, ARMSTRONG'S History of Majorca.

upon the summit of which stood a citadel that protected, but, at the same time, commanded the town <sup>y</sup>. This the king caused to be demolished, and instead of it built a most beautiful cathedral, a noble palace, and other public edifices, which were also well defended by towers, and other fortifications; the port he secured by a most noble mole, and established an excellent form of government, which, by rendering the inhabitants easy and happy, drew thither continual supplies of people from all parts <sup>z</sup>. In 1232, he made a second voyage thither, when he summoned the Moors, who inhabited Minorca, to submit, and, by a stratagem of lighting many fires every night along the opposite coast, terrified them to such a degree, with the apprehensions of an invasion, that he brought them to submit, and to pay him an annual tribute <sup>a</sup>. In 1256, he established his son Don Jayme in the possession of these dominions, which, however, gave great offence to the heir apparent of the crown of Arragon, and notwithstanding, as we have shewn in the former section, that he had formerly bestowed them upon the infant Don Pedro of Portugal, as an equivalent for the countries which he had acquired by marriage <sup>b</sup>.

Don
Jayme II.
succeeds in
the kingdom of Majorca,
in virtue
of his father's
will.

A. D.
1276.

1278.

DON Jayme the second, upon the demise of his father, succeeded to the throne, in virtue of his father's will, who bestowed upon him, not only the kingdom of Majorca, and all its dependencies, but likewise the lordship of Montpellier, the counties of Roussillon, Collioure, Conflant, Cerdagne, Vallepir, and all that he possessed in France <sup>c</sup>. Don Pedro the third of Arragon, though he was by no means satisfied with this disposition, yet confirmed it, upon condition that his brother should do him homage, and hold his territories as a feudatory to the crown of Arragon; which appears clearly from a treaty between them, in the month of January, in the year following the death of their father <sup>d</sup>. However, Don Jayme was so offended with this, and with his not having the kingdom of Valentia, which he surmised his father likewise intended him, that when Philip the hardy, in pursuance of the pope's invitation, determined to invade

<sup>y</sup> DAMETO, COLMENARES, Abbe d'VAYRAC. <sup>z</sup> Historia general del Reyno Balearico, Les Delices de l'Espagne, tom. iv. p. 577. Abbe d'VAYRAC. <sup>a</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Arragonensium Rerum Commentarii. <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MARIANA Histoire de Languedoc. <sup>d</sup> Historia de Malorca, per VINCETE MUR, Fol. in Malorca 1650. ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

Arragon, he not only granted him a free passage through his territories, which perhaps might have been justified, as he was his feudatory for the countries held on the continent, but also assisted him in his war against his brother *. This so provoked that monarch, that he sent his son, the infant Don Alonso, with a potent fleet and army to depose his uncle, which he accordingly did; the people willingly submitted, on account of the heavy taxes that had been imposed upon them by Don Jayme; he likewise reduced the island of Ivica, and left strong garrisons therein, and at the same time projected the entire reduction of Minorca †. The reason of this seems to have been, that the inhabitants, notwithstanding their submission to Don Jayme the first, continued their piracies; for which the sole remedy his prudence could suggest was to expell them that country: and this, after a vigorous war of two years, he gloriously effected, by the capitulation of Port Mahon, and of St. Agatha, when the Moors consented to give him a certain sum of money for every head to obtain leave to retire into Barbary, and that such as had it not to give, should remain, and submit to such terms as he thought fit to prescribe ‡.

A. D.
1283.

1285.

THE king Don Jayme, who still retained Roussillon and the rest of the countries he held in France, gave his nephew all the disturbance he could; but this served only to increase the weight of his misfortunes, as all his attempts proved unsuccessful. However, by the interposition of the pope and the king of France, Don Alonso, upon the conclusion of a general peace, consented to restore his uncle to all his dominions, to be held, as before, by homage rendered to the crown of Arragon; but before this treaty could be fully accomplished Don Alonso died §. His brother and successor Don Jayme the second was content that things should remain in this situation, as appears by a large and full treaty, which is still extant, concluded between them at Argilers, in which the former styles himself Don Jayme, by the grace of GOD, king of Arragon, Valentia, and Murcia, and count of Barcelona; and the latter king of the Majorcas, that is, Majorca and the islands dependant upon it, count of Roussillon and Cerdagne, and lord of Montpelier; in which they stipulate a perpetual friendship for 1287.

Deprived of his dominions by one nephew, and restored to them by another.A. D.
1291.

* Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. ABARCA, FERRERAS. † ZURITA, MARIANA, ARMSTRONG'S History of Minorca. ‡ Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. § HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, ZURITA, MARIANA.

A. D.
1311.

themselves and successors against all powers whatever, subject to the homage formerly stipulated; and this treaty bears date, June 9, 1298. By virtue of this treaty <sup>l</sup>, Don Jayme found himself once more in the peaceable possession of his dominions, and so continued to the time of his decease; which was about four years after. By his queen Esclaron-da, who was the daughter of the count de Foix, he had Don Jayme, who became a monk, Don Sancho, who succeeded him, Don Ferdinand, and Don Philip, who was an ecclesiastic. He had also a daughter Donna Sancha. The body of this prince Don Jayme the second lies interred in the cathedral church of Majorca <sup>k</sup>.

Don Sancho succeeds his father,
and governs his dominions
peaceably.

Don Sancho did homage to Philip the fair, king of France, on the eighth of December the same year, for the lordship of Montpellier <sup>l</sup>, and, on the seventh of July in the year following, he likewise did homage to Don Jayme the second <sup>m</sup>. He had afterwards some dispute with the crown of France about his lordship of Montpellier, which the king of Arragon pretended was to be held of him, independent of the crown of France; and some proceedings there were upon this matter before the parliament of Paris; but Philip the long took the cognizance of this difference from them, and adjusted it with the two kings himself <sup>n</sup>. Don Sancho was a prince of a mild and equitable disposition, content with his small dominions, which he governed in peace to the time of his demise, which happened on the fourth of September, one thousand three hundred twenty-four, without issue <sup>o</sup>.

The king
of Arra-gon disposed to seize these territories
upon his dying
without
issue.

Don Jayme king of Arragon immediately seized his dominions, as has been mentioned in the former section: but the Spanish historians, and even those of the kingdom of Arragon, who very highly commend his justice in restoring them, do not give us any clear account upon what motives the original measure was taken. It seems in the will of Don Jayme the conqueror, king both of Arragon and Majorca, there was a substitution of the royal house of Arragon, in case the heirs male should fail of Don Jayme, king of Majorca; and some of the counsellors of the king of Arragon persuaded him, that Don Sancho dying without heirs, he had a just title to the kingdom under that will <sup>p</sup>. But the infant Don Philip of Majorca represented to him, that Don Jayme the second left four sons, of whom the late king Don Sancho was not the eldest, but succeeded in the place of his brother, who had renounced the world; that his next brother Don Ferdinand, who should have been his successor, was indeed dead, but had left by his wife Donna Izabella, heiress of the Morea, a son Don Jayme, who was indisputably the heir male of his grandfather, and consequently entitled, under that will, to the kingdom of Majorca, and its dependencies <sup>q</sup>.

<sup>l</sup> Hist. de Malorca, por VINCENTE MUT, lib. iv. ZURITA, FERRER'S. <sup>k</sup> VINCENTE MUT, ZURITA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>l</sup> Histoire de Languedoc. <sup>m</sup> VINCENTE MUT, ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>n</sup> ZURITA Hist. de Languedoc. <sup>o</sup> VINCENTE MUT, Indicēs ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. MARIANA,

THE infant Don Philip of Majorca did homage, as guardian of his nephew, and in his name, on the first of October, one thousand three hundred twenty-seven, to Don Jayme the second of Arragon, and by the interest of the same Don Philip a marriage was concluded, for the young king, with the infanta Donna Constantia of Arragon, daughter to Don Alonso heir apparent of that kingdom <sup>r</sup>. It is indeed suggested by Mariana, that it was in regard to this marriage Don Jayme of Arragon sacrificed his claim to the crown of Majorca; but this seems very improbable, since the young king had infinitely more interest in marrying that princess than her grandfather could have in disposing of her, since he might, without difficulty, have matched her to princes of equal rank and greater power. On the twenty-fifth of October, one thousand three hundred twenty-eight, Don Jayme of Majorca did homage in person to king Alonso the fourth of Arragon his father-in-law <sup>s</sup>; when, without question, the treaties between the two crowns were renewed: by which it was settled, that they should assist each other with their whole force; and in case any differences arose between them, the points in controversy were to be determined by the pope: neither is there any reason to suppose, that Don Alonso would insist upon any harder terms from a prince of his blood, and his son-in-law, than the kings his predecessors had done from the ancestors of this young prince; but, on the contrary, there is nothing more probable, than that Don Jayme looked upon himself as very secure of support from Arragon, as well in consideration of this alliance, as of those treaties by which he was strictly speaking entitled to it <sup>t</sup>.

Don
Jayme
III. does homage to the king
of Arra-gon, and espouses
his daughter Donna Constan-tia.

<sup>p</sup> Historia de Malorca, por VINCENTE MUT. Histoire de Languedoc. <sup>q</sup> VINCENTE MUT, MARIANA. <sup>r</sup> Corps Diplomatique de Droits des Gens. <sup>s</sup> VINCENTE MUT, ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>t</sup> VINCENTE MUT, ZURITA, A-BARCA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.

Obtains
supplies by means of the pope
for the war against the Moors,
and employs them
very successfully.

A. D.
1331.

It may be, that his conceiving too highly of the benefits he might draw from this alliance might induce him to frame false ideas of his own power, and put him upon making a greater figure than his predecessors had done. The very situation of his dominions, and their tenure, exposed him to continual difficulties, in which the making one or two false steps was more than sufficient to throw himself and his subjects into the utmost distress. The circumstances of the times were very critical; and though he was a prince of high courage, and did not want abilities, yet his having a spirit superior to his fortune, and his affecting an independency which was altogether impracticable, drew him quickly into perplexities, and, in the end, proved his ruin <sup>u</sup>. He was summoned by Philip de Valois, king of France, to do homage for his lordship of Montpellier, and all its dependencies; and being, at that time, embarrassed by the Moors, he accordingly did homage on the twenty-eighth of April, though unwillingly, as conceiving there was none due <sup>w</sup>. He applied himself the same year to pope John the twenty-second for two favours, the first was, a power to levy the tenths upon the clergy; the second, a permission to send three ships with rich merchandize to Alexandria; for without the licence of the pope, in those days, Christian princes could not suffer their subjects to have any correspondence with the infidels; and both were to enable him to defend his territories from the invasions of the Moors, and to clear the adjacent seas from their corsairs <sup>x</sup>. The pope granted him both his requests, provided that the ships he sent to Alexandria did not furnish the infidels with arms or military stores; and, in all probability, these supplies enabled him to protect his subjects, and to repress the pirates of Barbary <sup>y</sup>. We have good reason to believe, that his success in this served to support and to heighten that ambition, which was but too high already.

Breaks
with the French
king, and is dispossessed of all

UPON the demise of his father-in-law Don Alonso, he was summoned by Don Pedro the fourth to do him homage, which he accordingly did, on the seventeenth of July, in the states of Catalonia, assembled at Barcelona. The very next year, his dispute broke out with the king of France, who, being jealous of his intention to shake off his sovereignty, had expressly forbid him to celebrate jousts or tournaments in any of the places he held from him, without his permission first obtained; in contempt of which the king of Majorca caused them to be performed <sup>2</sup>. He was encouraged to this, by the dangerous war in which Philip de Valois was then engaged with the crown of England, and the hopes he had of being supported both by that monarch, and the king of Arragon <sup>3</sup>. Some historians deny this, others pass it over; but there are unquestionable authorities to prove, that there was at this time an alliance brought upon the carpet between the crowns of England, Arragon, and Majorca, against France. There is, however, great reason to believe, that Don Pedro was never at all in earnest, but took these steps purely with a view to amuse and mislead this unhappy prince to his destruction <sup>b</sup>. Don Pedro was a great politician, and having formed in his own mind a resolution to deprive him of all that he held, as a feudatory to the crown of Arragon, he judged that nothing could be more conducive to the effectual execution of this scheme than to leave the French king at full liberty to strip him of all the lordships for which he had done him homage. He executed this perfidious plan with such dexterity and address, as deceived the unhappy Don Jayme to the last <sup>c</sup>; who by letters, ambassadors, and personal applications, repeated his demands of succours, in virtue of the treaties subsisting between them, and on the score of his being his vassal; which succours, though Don Pedro, under various specious pretences, declined, yet he would never deny, but flattered him with hopes, till the French, by dint of a superior power, deprived Don Jayme of the lordship of Montpellier, and all its dependencies, and then, as at the proper season, he disclosed his meaning plainly <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> VINCENTE MUT, RAINALD, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>w</sup> Hist. de Languedoc. Tresor. des Chart de Montpellier, No. xvi.

<sup>x</sup> RAINALD Historia de Malorca. <sup>y</sup> ZURITA, VINCENTE MUT.

A. D.
1340.

1341.

He caused, as we have said in a former section, the king of Majorca to be summoned, to answer to certain points of accusation that were brought against him, nor would he grant him any delay, though he desired it; and in his own memoirs, Don Pedro acknowledges, that all the answers he gave to his applications were, Let him appear

Cruelty and injustice of Don Pedro in his usage of the king
of Majorca.

<sup>2</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. Histoire de Languedoc.

<sup>3</sup> ZURITA Histoire de Languedoc. FER-

RERAS. <sup>b</sup> RYMER'S Fœdera, tom. v. ZURITA Histoire de Languedoc.

<sup>c</sup> Historia de Malorca. ABARCA, FERRE-
RAS. <sup>d</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus Gestarum. ABARCA.

before the states; let him justify his own conduct, and I will grant his request. As to two of the three points of the charge, that is, that he had entered into a war with the king of France without his consent, and that he had imposed very heavy taxes upon his subjects, they were plainly things with which he had nothing to do; for, by the treaty subsisting between them, they were reciprocally obliged to assist each other if attacked; but the king of Majorca was not at all restrained from making war or peace as he thought fit: and, in respect to taxes, it is in express words declared, the king of Majorca might impose and levy them as he thought proper<sup>c</sup>. In regard to the third head, of coining money at Perpignan, the king of Majorca was not so excusable, as there was a clause which prohibited this in the treaties; and as it appeared to have been the intention of the original donor Don Jayme the first of Arragon, that no money should be current in the five counties, bestowed upon this prince's grandfather, but what was coined at Barcelona<sup>f</sup>. We are assured by Mariana, that, besides the heads beforementioned, there were other accusations, of a far more heinous nature, such as having formed a design to assassinate the king of Arragon at their last interview, which, out of humanity and the affection due from a sister, the queen Donna Constantia had discovered to Don Pedro; and that he had offered to enter into an alliance against him, not only with the king of France, but with the king of Morocco<sup>g</sup>. These, very probably, were only thrown in to make up weight, or to deter the king from appearing, if he had any such design; since, if they had been founded in truth, they would have been far better reasons for depriving him of his dominions than those which were assigned.

From
whom he takes that island, and all its dependencies
by an invasion.

THE king of Majorca, being no longer at a loss to know his brother-in-law's intentions, published a manifesto, in which he loaded him with reproaches, declared war against him, and took the best measures he could for his own defence. The historian of Majorca asserts, that, in the midst of his misfortunes, his subjects were never wanting in their fidelity, and produces a public instrument of their's<sup>h</sup>, by which they approve and justify that monarch's conduct; which is directly contrary to what the historians of Arragon assert,

<sup>c</sup> VINCENTE MUT, ZURITA, ABARCA.
Malorca. ZURITA Histoire de Languedoc.
general de España, lib. xvi. <sup>h</sup> Historia de Malorca, por VIN-CENTE MUT.

<sup>f</sup> Historia de
<sup>g</sup> Historia ge-

as to their being universally discontented, and of their inviting Don Pedro to deliver them <sup>i</sup>. But perhaps truth in this case may lie on both sides, that is, the people of Majorca, while the king was in possession, might publish, or might allow him to publish, whatever he thought proper, in their names, for his justification, and yet be secretly discontented, and entertain a private correspondence with his enemies. At least there seems to be some cause to suspect this, from the slender resistance that Don Pedro met with, when he soon after invaded Majorca <sup>k</sup>. It also appears, that there must have been great errors in government, from the condition that things were then in; for, notwithstanding the extremity to which he was reduced, and the necessity he was under of raising the whole force of his dominions, Don Jayme was not able to bring into the field above a third part of the troops which the Moorish king assembled, when in the like circumstances; neither did these make any considerable defence: but all things fell immediately into such confusion, that the king, though personally brave, was constrained to seek his safety in flight, and that with a few followers only, while Don Pedro made a public entry into Majorca with loud acclamations of the people, leaving a viceroy behind him, with a small number of forces, who held these territories afterwards without trouble or dispute on the part of the people, whom the historians of Arragon therefore affirm to have been very well pleased with this revolution <sup>l</sup>.

We have in a former section related how this war ended, The king and the unfortunate king of Majorca was despoiled of all his dominions, and even of his regal title, by his enemy, which induced him to retire to the count de Foix, to preserve his life and liberty, with a power at least of meditating revenge: he sent a long memorial, containing the history of the injuries that had been done him, to pope Clement the sixth, who interposed with Don Pedro, in regard especially to the king's family, exhorting him to restore at least his queen and his children, if not his dominions; upon which Don Pedro suffered his sister Donna Constantia to go to her husband <sup>m</sup>. It is also certain, that he solicited the king of France to interpose in his behalf, who treated him very unkindly, though he gave him fair words and fine promises <sup>n</sup>. Don Jayme, to

of France
seizes
what
small ter- ritories the king of Majorca
had left.
A. D.
1345.

<sup>i</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS.
YERNE TURQUET, MARIANA.
goniæ regibus gestarum, ABARCA, FERRERAS.
ABARCA, Histoire de Languedoc.
Hist. Languedoc, BALUZ.

<sup>k</sup> ABARCA, MA-
<sup>l</sup> Indices rerum ab Arra-
<sup>m</sup> ZURITA,
<sup>n</sup> Historia de Majorca,

shew, that though his fortune might, yet his spirit never could, be broken, embarked a small body of troops aboard a few gallies, and attempted to make a descent on Majorca; but was repulsed in such a manner, that he was obliged to retire; upon which, taking advantage of the troubles in Arragon, he made an irruption into Roussillon, and recovered the county of Conflans; but Don Pedro marching against him from Barcelona, a smart action happened between them at Vinea, in which Don Jayme was routed, and forced to retire*. He made afterwards an attempt upon Puycerdan with the like ill fortune; and at this time the king of France seized his lordship of Montpelier, alleging, that, as he was his vassal, and had made these incursions without his leave, he had forfeited that seigniory<sup>P</sup>. This fact is put out of all doubt by a letter from the pope to the French king, dated August the eighteenth, the same year, intreating him to restore that lordship, that this unhappy prince might not be driven to absolute despair, or his family, descending from a long race of kings, be utterly deprived of subsistence<sup>Q</sup>. It appears from hence how much those authors are mistaken who assert, that Don Jayme of Majorca was present in the battle of Cressy; and how much more those writers are deceived who affirm, that he was killed there August the 25th, 1346, which is a piece of false history that deserves certainly to be exploded, though it has so long passed current amongst us<sup>r</sup>.

A. D.
1347.

1349.
*Buy the lordship of Montpelier, and thereby sacrifices that unhappy
monarch.*

ALL his disappointments served only to sharpen the courage of Don Jayme, who having, by a deed, signed the eighteenth of April, at Avignon, and assented to by both his children, sold the lordship of Montpelier, and all its dependencies, to the king of France, for one hundred and twenty thousand golden crowns<sup>s</sup>; he spent the whole in raising an army for the recovery of Majorca. Some writers say, that this consisted of three hundred horse and three thousand foot; others say, fifteen hundred horse and eleven thousand foot; it may be the former was the number of troops he carried over, and the latter of his army when joined by his

* Indices rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus gestarum. Hist. de Languedoc. FERRERAS.

BALUZ, FERRERAS.

<sup>P</sup> Histoire de Languedoc.

<sup>Q</sup> RAINALD, BALUZ, Histoire de Languedoc.

<sup>r</sup> ADAM MURIMOTHCONT TRIVET Chron.

HEN. KNIGHTON Chron. THORN, WALSINGHAM, GIOVAN. VILLANI à Stowe, BARNES's, &c.

<sup>s</sup> Indices rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus gestarum. ABARCA, FERRERAS.

partisans

partisans in Majorca<sup>t</sup>. He was as unfortunate in his last as in his former expeditions; for, before he could have time for taking any proper measures for augmenting his forces, by the accession of all who were yet well affected to him in Majorca, he was attacked by Gilbert de St. Ellas, viceroy of that island, and by Rimbao de Corbera, viceroy of Sardinia, at the head of eight hundred horse and twenty thousand foot, all old troops; upon which his new-raised forces immediately fled, but, those he brought with him remaining firm, the king fought it out to the last, and, refusing quarter, was pierced through the body with a lance, after which, as some say, the Catalans cut off his head<sup>u</sup>. This happened on Sunday the twenty-fifth of October. In him ended the monarchs of Majorca, of the royal house of Arragon<sup>w</sup>. By his first wife, Donna Constantia, he had two children, Don Jayme and Donna Isabella; by his second, Donna Roland, or Donna Violante, whom he married after her decease, which happened in the year 1346, it does not appear that he had any issue.

We might here close this section, without pursuing the Reasons history of this unlucky family any farther; but then some for pursu- passages in the foregoing history, and others in the following ing the his- sections, would be left very obscure, and, which is worse, tory of this under great suspicion of inaccuracy, falshood, and contradic- unfortu- tion; which is frequently the case with writers of general nate fami- history, by their affecting brevity too much. We will there- ly, to its fore give a succinct account of the son of this monarch extinction Don Jayme the younger, whom the Italian writers stile sometimes James of Majorca, from his pretensions to that kingdom; and sometimes James of Tarracona, from the place of his birth, better known afterwards by the more illustrious title of king of Naples<sup>x</sup>; which did not hinder him from bearing still in his mind the claims that he derived from his birth, which led him into adventures that have brought him more than once in our way; and it is to reduce them into their natural order, and to fix their dates from authentic authorities, that we find ourselves obliged to resume them here. The strange errors which some great authors have

<sup>t</sup> Histoire de Languedoc. ZURITA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.

<sup>u</sup> Indices rerum ab Arragoniæ

regibus gestarum. ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>w</sup> VINCENTE

MUT, ZURITA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, ABARCA, MARIANA,

FERRERAS. <sup>x</sup> PANDELFEO COLLENUCCIO, Historia del

Reyno de Napoli, lib. v. TOMAZO COSTO, Annotazione e

Supplementi.

fallen into upon his account, will sufficiently justify our conduct.

Adventures of Don Jayme IV. from his birth, to his escape out of prison.

A. D.
1362.

We cannot fix the time of this prince's birth, though we can come pretty near it, for, in the ratification of his father's sale of the lordship of Montpelier, dated May 15th, 1349, he is said to be more than eleven, and under fourteen y. In October the same year he was taken prisoner in Majorca, and sent by his uncle to be kept at Barcelona, where, on the first of May, having found means to furnish himself with false keys and with arms, he opened the prison-doors, and, having slain Nicholas Rovira, who was his keeper, and would have hindered him, he made his escape to Avignon, where he was protected and caressed by the pope<sup>z</sup>. As he was at this time esteemed one of the handsomest and most accomplished princes of the age, queen Joan of Naples, who was just become a widow, offered him her person and her crown, which, in his circumstances, he thought it prudent to accept<sup>a</sup>. His sister Donna Isabella likewise espoused John the marquis of Montferrat, and received from her uncle Don Pedro a considerable fortune<sup>b</sup>; but, notwithstanding this seeming turn of fortune, he was still so possessed with a desire to recover his hereditary dominions, and found so many circumstances that embittered his stay at Naples, even with the regal title, that, four years afterwards, we find him at Bordeaux, soliciting Edward the black prince to assist him in the recovery at least of his dominions on that side the Pyrenees; which the prince promised him, provided he would attend him in his expedition into Spain; which he did<sup>c</sup>, and, in his passage, must have marched through his uncle's territories, who could not be very well pleased to see a young monarch, who, contrary to the ties of nature, and the law of nations, he had so much injured.

A. D.
1366.

Marries queen Joan out of Castile, he was constrained to leave Don Jayme sick of Naples, behind him, and by this means it was that he fell into the hands of Don Henry, king of Castile, a prince, who, having felt the weight of misfortunes himself, had a generous concern for the distresses of others<sup>d</sup>. He treated the king of

THE next summer, when the prince of Wales retired out of Castile, he was constrained to leave Don Jayme sick of Naples, behind him, and by this means it was that he fell into the hands of Don Henry, king of Castile, a prince, who, having felt the weight of misfortunes himself, had a generous concern for the distresses of others<sup>d</sup>. He treated the king of

<sup>y</sup> Histoire de Languedoc.

<sup>z</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus gestarum, ABARCA. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA, PANDELFEO COLLENUCCIO, Historia del Reyno de Napoli, BRANTOME.

<sup>b</sup> Indices Rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus gestarum. ABARCA, FERRERAS.

<sup>c</sup> RAINALD, FERRERAS.

<sup>d</sup> BARNES'S History of Edward III. lib. iv. cap. 2.

Naples kindly, but kept him a prisoner till he had made his peace with Arragon, when Don Pedro was in hopes that he would either have delivered him up, or have confined him closer; but the king Don Henry suffered him soon after to go to Avignon, where, by the assistance of the duke of Anjou, he for four years together alarmed the king of Arragon at least, and at length assembled an army, with which he advanced as far as the Pegro, where, finding himself distressed for provisions, and his forces in danger of being surrounded, he sent to Don Henry of Castile for assistance and advice<sup>c</sup>. That great and gallant monarch gave him both; he offered him his court for an asylum, and he promised to persuade or to compel the king of Arragon to grant him an establishment; and, to deliver him out of his present perplexity, he ordered a corps of troops to advance to Soria, where the king of Majorca joined them. But unhappy princes are commonly deceived by the glimmerings of good fortune; Don Jayme fatigued himself so much in this forced march, that, being seized by a malignant fever, he died in a few days, and was buried in the monastery of St. Francis, in the town of Soria<sup>f</sup>. The reader will judge what credit is due to those historians who so positively assert, that his consort queen Joan of Naples, having found him in bed with a mistress, caused him to be beheaded<sup>g</sup>. A. D. 1375.

His sister D. Isabella, widow of John marq. of Montferrat, was His sister, with him at that time, and, by the interposition of the king of Donna Castile, a convention was concluded with the king of Arragon, by which a sum of money was given her for the pay of the troops that were about her, and they were allowed to retire without molestation<sup>h</sup>. It was this princess, who, after the decease of her brother, confirmed the donation, which, in conjunction with him, she had made of all their rights to the duke of Anjou, to whom they were under very great obligations<sup>i</sup>. How these pretensions were afterwards transferred, and at length extinguished, has been shewn in its proper place, so that we are now at liberty to return to the history of Arragon. But, before we do this, it may not be improper to take notice of an observation made by Ferreras, that the misfortunes of Don Jayme the third, king of Majorca, ought to be a perpetual warning to all princes in his

<sup>c</sup> ZURITA, ABARCA, FERRERAS, CA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

of Joan Queen of Naples, in BAYLE'S Dictionary.

<sup>h</sup> Indices rerum ab Arragoniæ regibus gestarum.

<sup>i</sup> ABAZCA, Histoire de Languedoc, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET, MARIANA.

<sup>e</sup> ZURITA, ABAR-

<sup>g</sup> See the article

situation, who should be extremely careful to preserve their dominions in peace, and by that means secure the affections of their subjects, who, jealous of their own happiness, will make such efforts for its preservation as they would think impracticable in defence of any monarch's title. Time, and a prudent use of favourable events, may gradually aggrandize even the smallest sovereignty; but a little king who racks his subjects, that he may make a figure which he esteems worthy of a crowned head, takes the surest and speediest method of being no king at all<sup>k</sup>. To this we may add, that, if Don Jayne the younger had lived to be an old man, he would have been the indubitable heir of his persecutor's dominions, and consequently have prevented that struggle amongst the competitors for this succession, of which it will be our business to give the reader a comprehensive view at the beginning of the next section, which will conclude the history of Arragon, and all the territories annexed to it, before its conjunction with Castile in the persons of Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella.

<sup>k</sup> Historia de Espana, sect. 14.

S E C T. XII.

The History of the Kingdom of Arragon, continued from the Interregnum on the Death of Don Martin, to the Union of the Crowns of Castile and Arragon, under their Catholic Majesties Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella.

A succinct view of the state of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, during the interregnum.

TH E R E never was a country left in a more miserable or exposed condition than this of Arragon, by the death of the king Don Martin, who, in the last months of his life, employed all his thoughts to preserve himself in ease and safety, without being obliged to declare in favour of any of the pretenders, who he knew could none of them be settled in the legal and quiet possession of the throne, but by the authority of the states, to whose decision therefore he was inclined to leave it<sup>a</sup>. Upon his demise, all things seemed to fall to pieces; Arragon, Valentia, Catalonia, became at once sovereign states, without any other union than their mutual regard for their own interests, which were better consulted

<sup>a</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Arragonensium rerum Commentarii, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

by

by their having but one sovereign, than any other way ; and yet separately they were in great confusion. In Arragon the factions of the Lunas and the Urreas, the former espousing the party of the count de Urgel, while the latter, who were his declared enemies, scattered discord through every corner of the kingdom <sup>b</sup>. In Valentia, the Contellas and the Villaraguedes, by their dissensions, did the like <sup>c</sup>. In Catalonia things were in a more composed condition, the states immediately assembled, and assumed the government <sup>d</sup>. In Majorca, and the islands dependent upon it, all things were perfectly quiet, through the care of Don Roger de Moncada <sup>e</sup>. Sardinia was torn to pieces by a civil war ; and in Sicily, Don Bernard de Cabrera, count of Modica, held a very suspicious conduct, seizing by force most of the considerable places, putting garrisons in them, fitting out several squadrons to cruise upon the coasts, though he pretended to aim at nothing more than preserving the island for the crown of Arragon ; and yet he besieged the queen dowager Donna Blanca, who had assumed the title and power of queen regent for the same purpose <sup>f</sup>. What is most extraordinary, notwithstanding all these quarrels and disturbances, there was nothing lost ; and though it was a long time before they were appeased, yet, when that happened, all things fell into the old chanel, and the lustre of the crown of Arragon was not at all diminished. A felicity that has scarce ever attended a complicated succession left in such a manner.

A. D.
1310.

POPE Benedict the thirteenth, who was himself an Arragonian, used all imaginable methods to quiet the minds of the people in that kingdom, and in Valentia, to very little purpose <sup>g</sup>. Some indeed of the nobility in both kingdoms acted like good patriots, and acted to the utmost of their power for the welfare of the state ; in order to which, they procured a truce to be made in Arragon for three years, by which all private quarrels, on what pretence soever, were to be suspended during that time, and to this they were sworn. It was in general so well observed, that, when Don Antonio de Luna demanded a conference with the archbishop of Saragossa, Don Garcia Fernandez de Heredia, he made no scruple of consenting to it, though he was the head of the opposite faction. When they met, Don Antonio picked a quarrel

The states appoint a standing committee to regulate the ensuing election.

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET
<sup>c</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. <sup>d</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA.
<sup>e</sup> DAMEYO, MUT, Historia de Malorca por VINCENTE MUT.
<sup>f</sup> Historia general de la Isla y Reyno de Cerdena, ZURITA.
<sup>g</sup> RAINALD.

with the archbishop, and, having posted an ambuscade conveniently for that purpose, attacked and murdered him, which threw the whole kingdom into a flame, and alarmed not a little the parliament, then sitting at Callatayud; to oppose which, Don Antonio and his party called another assembly, to which they gave that title in another place<sup>a</sup>. In Valentia the troubles were very near as great, and the malecontents had recourse to the same method of meeting again in another place, and of calling themselves a parliament. In both kingdoms they were forced to have recourse to the infant Don Ferdinand of Castile, to desire that he would send troops to protect them, and to give a proper degree of weight to the only legal authority subsisting in either country<sup>i</sup>. In Catalonia things went somewhat better; the parliament at Tortosa were generally and chearfully obeyed; so that when the count d'Urgel advanced with a body of troops, the parliament sent him so quick a message, that he thought fit to retire. They likewise desired the infant Don Ferdinand to withdraw his forces; from which he excused himself, as they were not sent to awe but to protect the parliaments of Arragon and Valentia<sup>k</sup>. These three assemblies, having conferred by deputations, agreed to lose no time in the election, or rather declaration, of a king, for which purpose they appointed a standing committee to take the preparatory measures, who were to meet and hold their deliberations at Alcaniz. The troops, however, of the count de Urgel committed so many disorders, that the parliaments were obliged to have recourse to the infant of Castile for troops sufficient to keep the passages to that place clear and safe; and, after this, the deputies from all three parliaments resorted thither, and began to enter in earnest upon the business<sup>l</sup> entrusted to their care.

A. D.
1411.

*At length nine judges
are chosen,
to determine the title of the claimants.*

AFTER mature deliberation, it was resolved, that this great affair should be decided by nine judges, men of experience and integrity, and that each state should chuse three; and that they should meet at Caspé, a place standing very conveniently on the frontiers of Valentia and Catalonia, belonging to the knights templars; but upon this occasion, by the permission of the pope, there was put into it a very strong garrison, composed of Arragonese and Catalan troops, for at that time the two parliaments of Valentia kept that country

<sup>a</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. ZURITA, FERRERAS.
<sup>i</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA. <sup>k</sup> HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. <sup>l</sup> MARIANA, ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

so divided, that it was not easy <sup>1</sup> to distinguish where the authority lay. Orders were given to the several competitors to send their agents to Caspi<sup>m</sup>. In the mean time the civil war which had begun the year before in Valentia, rose to such a height, that the viceroy, who was intirely in the interest of the count of Urgel, endeavoured to join a body of his forces with all the strength of his own party; but, being intercepted by the chiefs of the opposite faction, an action ensued on the twenty-seventh of January, in which there were five thousand slain, and, amongst them, the viceroy and the grand bailiff<sup>n</sup>. There happened at this time an incident which manifests the true spirit of party; the victors obliged Don Arnold de Bellera, the son of the viceroy, to carry his father's head upon a pole, when they made their public entry into Morviedo. This melancholy affair, however, was attended with some good events, for the people in general began to see the folly of keeping up these divisions, and consequently the rage of parties gradually declined; insomuch that, towards the end of March, the two parliaments united, and sent a detachment of troops to make their quota of the garrison of the fortrefs of Caspi, into which, without any dispute, they were received, and all things disposed for the reception of this august tribunal<sup>o</sup>, to whom the preservation of so many kingdoms was consigned.

THE judges were not chosen with the same facility. The Catalans and Valentians especially were much divided. At length, understanding that the Arragonese had referred the choice of their commissaries to the viceroy and chief justice, they all agreed to leave the nomination of their judges to the same persons; who declared for the kingdom of Arragon, Don Dominic Ram, bishop of Huesca, Don Francisco de Aranda, Don Berenger de Bardogi; for the principality of Catalonia, Don Pedro Zaggariga, archbishop of Terragona, Don Gulermo de Balseca, and Don Bernard de Galbes; for the kingdom of Valentia, Don Boniface de Ferrier, general of the chartreux, his brother Vincent de Ferrier, of the orders of frier preachers, a man of a vehement disposition, but who, by his probity and disinterestedness, had acquired a general reputation of a saint, and Don Gines de Rabaza, the most celebrated civil lawyer in the kingdom. But when the judges were all arrived, had taken their respective seats, and, in their first sessions, appointed tutors to maintain the cause

Who, by the consent of all the parliaments, are named by the viceroy and chief justice of Arragon.

<sup>m</sup> ZURITA, RAINALD, FERRERAS.

<sup>n</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ COMMENT. PEREZ DE GUZMAN, MAYERNE TURQ.

<sup>o</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS, MARIANA.

of Don Frederic, count de Luna, on account of his youth, the last of these judges, Don Ginez de Rabaza, either lost, or pretended to lose, his senses; upon which his family had leave to withdraw him; and Pedro Bertran, another very eminent lawyer, was appointed in his stead P.

These judges meet at Caspé, open their tribunal, and bear the claims of the several pretenders.

WE have insisted the longer upon this affair, as there are but very few instances in history where the rights of succession have been canvassed before a tribunal composed of judges who were immediately to become the subjects of him in whose favour they declared, and whose authority, after their decision, was as properly owned and submitted to as before. It is true, that some exceptions were taken by two of the parliaments, upon their nomination, against some of the judges, upon a presumption that their sentiments were already known; but, in answer to this, it was alleged, that stations change men, and that the notions of the private person might give way to the lights acquired by the judges; that it would not be easy to replace them by men of as great character, not liable to the same objection; and, lastly, that these exceptions came too late, since it was unanimously agreed to adhere to the persons named by the viceroy and the grand bailiff; and at length all the parliaments acquiesced. It is now time to inform the reader who the competitors were, and how their claims were supported; since, in the course of this or perhaps of any other history, there is scarce a parallel of a proceeding of this nature, in which all things were conducted with a dignity and an impartiality suitable to the importance of that question which they were to decide.

Who the claimants were, and how their pretensions were founded.

THERE were in the whole seven competitors, five princes and two princesses. The first of these was Don Alonso, duke of Gandia, the son of the infant Don Pedro, and the grandson of Don Jayme II. king of Arragon, so that he was a direct male descendant of the royal house of Arragon. This prince died while the controversy was depending; upon which Don Juan count de Prades, his brother, claimed in preference to his nephew the count of Denia, son to the deceased duke. But the judges determined clearly that the right accruing to the duke of Gandia, in case he had any right, accrued at the death of the king Don Martin; and that therefore the title, whatever it was, must be in his son, who was his representative, and not his brother. Don Jayme count de Urgel was the next claimant, as being the son of Don

P HIERONYMI BLANCÆ COMMENT. ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. FERRERAS. 3 ABARCA, MARIANA.

Pedro

Pedro count d'Urgel, and the grandson of the infant Don Jayme, who was so created by his father Don Alonso the fourth, the eldest son and successor of Don Jayme the second; so that it was alleged he had clearly a better right than the duke of Gandia, since, Don Jayme the second being their common ancestor, he claimed under the eldest, whereas the duke claimed under the youngest son. The third was Don Frederic count de Luna, natural son to Don Martin the younger, king of Sicily, who would have been indisputably the heir of all these dominions, but for the flaw in his birth; to help which, three legitimations were insisted upon, that of his father, that of his grandfather, and that of the pope. However, upon examining these legitimations, it appeared, that the intention of them all was to qualify him for the succession in Sicily; and, in the act of legitimation by his grandfather, it was declared, in express terms, that he should not be qualified or intitled thereby to succeed to the crowns of Arragon, Valentia, Sardinia, Corfica, and Majorca, or to the counties of Barcelona, Roussillon, and Cerdagne. Lewis of Anjou, duke of Calabria, and count de Guise, claimed in right of his mother, Donna Violante, queen of Naples, daughter to Don Juan, the elder brother of Don Martin. That queen herself also claimed, as did Donna Isabella, the wife of the count of Urgel, as being the daughter of Don Pedro the fourth. Lastly, the infant Don Ferdinand of Castile set forth his title, being the son of Donna Leonora, the eldest sister of the two last kings.

THE advocates for his title seem to have been much abler men than those intrusted with the concerns of the other candidates; they set out with overturning all the old doctrine about the right of heirs female, which, in a military state, as that of Arragon originally was, they affirmed could never subsist, because an heir female is a perpetual minor, and therefore incapable of being at the head of such a state. As to the case of Petronilla, upon which all the other lawyers had stumbled, they removed it by a very subtle, but at the same time by a very plausible, distinction, asserting, that she neither had, nor was ever understood to have by the states, any right in her own person at all. Her husband Don Raymond never assumed the title of king, but administered the government till there should be one; that, upon his demise, she indeed assumed the title of queen, but it was only that there might be the greater formality in her act, by which she devolved the government upon her son Don Alonso, tho' an infant, who was the true heir of his grandfather Don Ramiro, surnamed the Monk. Upon this, the true rule of succession was laid down to be, that heirs female were excluded; but that the heirs male descended from females were capable of the succession, in proportion as they stood nearest in alliance to the last deceased prince, and were capable of administering the government; upon which principle the king of Castile had declined making any claim, tho' the representative of his father, who had a right prior to the infant Don Ferdinand, because he was at this time himself a minor. That, with regard to the duke of Calabria, the states had already precluded him, by setting aside his mother, as well as the countess of Foix her sister, when they called the late king Don Martin to the throne; so that, upon the whole, the infant Don Ferdinand was the nearest heir male to the last reigning prince, capable of the succession. However this had been received in Arragon, the Castilian lawyers had so fully possessed Don Ferdinand with an opinion of this title, that he would have asserted it by force.

Method in which the Castilian lawyers stated Don Ferdinand's title to the crown.

The majority of the judges decree in his favour, and the rest also acquiesce.

THE judges spent thirty days in hearing with great candour and calmness whatever could be offered to them in behalf of any of the candidates. This being done, they assembled, and debated the matter among themselves. Vincente Ferrier was the first who spoke, and declared for the infant Don Ferdinand; five more of the judges concurred with him; the archbishop of Tarragona gave his voice for the count d'Urgel, Gulermo de Balseca was of his opinion; as for Pedro Bertran, he declined giving any opinion at all, as not having had time to acquaint himself with their several pretensions. But as the three judges for Arragon, two of the Valentians, and one Catalan, were of the same opinion, they proceeded to draw up the decree, which was made public on the twenty-eighth of June, in the church of Caspé, with all the marks of solemnity that could be devised, and with great acclamations of the people, who were glad to see the interregnum at an end, and the antient form of government restored. It cannot, however, be supposed, that, in a case of this nature, any decree could be made that would have no malecontents. St. Vincent, as they stiled him, plainly perceived this, and that the count of Urgel had still a very strong party, who complained openly that they called an infant of Castile to the succession of the crown of Arra-

* HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

* Chroniques de Espanya, que tracta dels Reys, dels Gots, y dels Comtes de Barcelona, e Reys de Arago, compilada per MIGUEL CANONEL, Barcel. 1536. MAYERNE TURQUET.

gon,

gon, in prejudice to the noble race of the counts of Barcelona, from whom the count was indisputably descended ; and therefore he endeavoured to dispel their melancholy by a sermon that he preached the next day with great emphasis, but which, notwithstanding, made very little impression on those who were of another opinion, though it very strongly confirmed such as were in the same sentiments, as, in disputes of this nature, is commonly the case. The Castilian writers, when they tell us, that, exclusive of his pretensions, Don Ferdinand was, of all the candidates, the prince who, for his personal great qualities, best deserved the throne, cast a shade of calumny upon the judges, whom they labour to commend, for they were not appointed to consider of conveniencies, but to decide a point of right<sup>1</sup> by the known laws of their country.

UPON the closest inspection, however, it will probably appear to the candid and impartial reader, that they really discharged their consciences ; though it must be allowed that they cast the succession upon a prince, who, if they had been free to make their choice, would have best deserved their suffrages. Those who were in the interest of the count of Urgel magnified his descent in a direct line from the counts of Barcelona, without distinguishing that this could only give him a title to the principality of Catalonia, and and this too upon a supposition that heirs male, descending from females, were not capable of inheriting. But the principality of Catalonia and the kingdom of Valentia being united to the crown of Arragon by the assent of the states, the rule of succession to that crown was to be the rule of succession in the present case ; and as the counts of Barcelona had acquired the regal dignity by their descent from a female, there was no reason that another family should not acquire it in the same way, which was the unanimous sense of the commissioners of Arragon. Besides, the count of Urgel had taken up arms, had committed hostilities against his country, and was looked upon to be the author of the most execrable assassination of the archbishop of Saragossa. To all which we may add, that, to prevent the miseries of a civil war, the parliaments of Arragon, Valentia, and Catalonia, who had an unquestionable right of declaring and confirming the titles of their kings, had in the most solemn manner devolved their power upon this occasion on the nine judges, and were therefore bound to follow their decree, it being made upon mature deliberation, freely, and without any suspicion of corruption<sup>u</sup>. A kind of reasoning, which, through the whole of this affair, they had approved and pursued.

<sup>1</sup> HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, FERRERAS.

*He is ac-knowleg'd,
proclaim'd,
accepts the crown, and comes immediately
to tak:
possession of it.* ACCORDINGLY each of the parliaments sent deputies to the new king Don Ferdinand, to acknowledge his title, and to do him homage; which having accepted, he confirmed all who were in employment, and, in the beginning of August, he held an assembly of the states, received their oaths of fidelity to himself and to his son the infant Don Alonso, his heir apparent; the kingdoms of Sardinia and Sicily likewise submitted, and the Genoese concluded a truce with him for five years<sup>w</sup>. He went afterwards to Barcelona, where he

A. D. 1412. held the states of Catalonia, confirmed their privileges, and received their oaths<sup>x</sup>. The count of Urgel, however, could not be persuaded to acquiesce, or to pay his homage, though the king Don Ferdinand assured him of his favour, of indemnity for what was passed, and, as he had no children but daughters, offered to marry the eldest of them to his son the infant Don Henry, and to create him duke of Montalban. The count for some time kept the treaty on foot, and seemed to act as if he intended a submission, demanding an immense sum of money for the expences he had been at in pursuing his title to the crown, and other favours; which granted, he was content to do homage: however, Don Ferdinand would listen to nothing of that kind, but insisted on his doing homage first; which step taken, he was willing to do for the count whatever he could reasonably desire; and with this conduct the states of Catalonia were perfectly satisfied. But the count was privately taking other measures, in conjunction with Don Antonio de Luna, and other busy spirits, who were bent upon raising a civil war<sup>y</sup>, which turned not at all to their advantage, though it gave much disturbance to the new king, and brought many and great miseries upon their country.

*Reduces
the count
de Urgel, who had taken up arms against him.* AT the opening of the next year it appeared, that the count de Urgel had entered into an alliance with the duke of Clarence, had promised him his eldest daughter in marriage, and expected great succours from him out of Gascony; he took likewise every other measure that he thought capable of

<sup>u</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. ZURITA, ABARCA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>w</sup> ABARCA, HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>x</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. FERRERAS.

<sup>y</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MAYERNE TURQUET.

exciting

exciting domestic troubles, or bringing in foreign invaders. He prevailed so far as to cause some tumults in Saragossa, and to bring a multitude of adventurers of all nations, to try what was to be got by plundering Arragon and Catalonia; but he was not capable of bringing a strength into the field sufficient to look the king in the face, which obliged him to take shelter in the fortress of Balaquer, a very strong place, on the north side of the Segro, commanding a very pleasant and fertile country, which he defended with great courage and spirit for a long time, in hopes of being succoured by his foreign allies<sup>2</sup>. The king, Don Ferdinand, commanded the siege in person, in which the duke of Gandia served with great courage and reputation, and at length the count of Urgel was compelled to surrender at discretion, and to go and throw himself at the feet of the king Don Ferdinand<sup>2</sup>. The states of Catalonia, who at the beginning had declared him a traitor, passed sentence upon him of perpetual imprisonment; the king having absolutely promised him his life, they confiscated all his estate, and that of his mother, by whom he was principally encouraged to act as he did. The king sent the count to be kept in Castile, and ordered him to be treated with all possible lenity and respect, as<sup>b</sup> some authors say.

A. D.
1413.

In the month of January, Don Ferdinand was crowned Is. crown'd with great solemnity at Saragossa, where he created his eldest son prince of Gironne, and the infant Don Henry prince of Penafiel; gave audience to the ambassadors from the emperor, and most of the other crowned heads in Europe, and made several good laws. In the assembly of the states<sup>c</sup>, the same year, he had an interview with pope Benedict the thirteenth<sup>d</sup>. A conspiracy was soon after discovered, by the mother of the count of Urgel, to poison the king; and by the assistance of foreign troops to raise her son to the throne. The king caused her with great secrecy to be arrested; in her custody letters were found from the king of Portugal, the duke of Clarence, and other princes who were acquainted with her intrigues. The king confined her and her daughters strictly, but would not proceed to extremities<sup>e</sup>. He sent his son the infant Don Juan into Sicily, having signed the contract of marriage for him with the young queen of *with great solemnity at Saragossa, and is as well received at Arragon as possible.*A. D.

1414.

<sup>2</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment.    <sup>3</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.    <sup>b</sup> Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN,    <sup>c</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MAYERN? TURQUET, MARIANA.    <sup>d</sup> RAINALD, ABARCA.    <sup>e</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

Naples, but that princess had married the count de la Marche, of the house of Bourbon, before his arrival. The Neapolitans were extremely piqued at the queen's conduct, and made the king of Arragon offers of taking up arms in favour of the young prince; but Don Ferdinand told them, he had kingdoms enough already, and that, considering the inconstancy of their queen, he thought his son had a good escape<sup>f</sup>.

A. D. 1415. The states of Catalonia expose with him, on which he retires into Castile, and dies. THE countess of Urgel intending to send her daughters into France, the king sent for the two eldest to court, and left the two youngest with her, upon a promise that she would not send them out of the kingdom<sup>g</sup>. He had demanded of the states of Catalonia, a year before, a sum of money, to enable him to regulate the affairs of Sicily, which they were not inclined to grant; he made the same demand again this year at Barcelona, and was without ceremony refused; but was given to understand, that it was not out of disrespect to him, or for want of money, but to vindicate their privilege of refusing when they thought fit<sup>h</sup>; which the king took so extremely ill, that he went to make a tour into Castile, where, his health being before infirm, he died,

A. D. 1416. on the second of April, when he had governed the kingdom of Arragon three years nine months and five days. He had by his consort Donna Leonora de Albuquerque five sons, Don Alonso, prince of Gironne, the infants Don Juan, Don Henry, Don Sancho, and Don Pedro; all of whom, except Don Sancho, survived him; and as many daughters. He was a prince of the most unblemished character that the age produced, of real piety, strict justice, and great moderation; the only fault his new subjects found with him was, that he loved his countrymen the Castilians too much, and had too many of them about his person<sup>i</sup>; which, though in itself a virtue, was, in his situation misplaced.

Don Alonso THE prince of Gironne succeeded his father by the title to V. succeeds, and applies himself with great vigour to settle the government. of Alonso the fifth, and found the first moments of his reign perplexed by the insolence of pope Benedict the thirteenth, who, having amused his father with a promise of giving peace to the church by a resignation, was so much provoked at his renouncing obedience to him, and sending ambassadors to the council of Constance, as other Christian princes did, that he declared him a schismatic, and fallen from his regal dig-

<sup>f</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. ABARCA, FERRERAS.
<sup>g</sup> ZURITA, Annal Arragon. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQ.
<sup>h</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. <sup>i</sup> ZURITA, Annal.
 Arragon. ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

nity<sup>k</sup>; notwithstanding which, his partisans had the confidence to desire the king's leave to supply him with provisions in the fortrefs of Peniscola, where, without this indulgence, he must have perished. However, the king consented to their demand, without departing any farther from his father's measures<sup>l</sup>. About the same time Don Antonio Luna involved a great many persons of quality in a very black design against the king's life, and for putting Don Jayme, count of Urgel, upon the throne; for the carrying on which scheme, he had amassed from the friends of the count a million of florins; but, when it was upon the point of being carried into execution, it was discovered, and a list of all the nobility that had any share in it put into the king's hands; who tore it without reading it, contenting himself with saying, that he would at least force them to acknowledge he had more regard for their lives than they for his<sup>m</sup>. The wars in Sardinia and Corfica gave him great disturbance, so that at length he meditated an expedition in person; but he found the same difficulty his father had done in procuring supplies; instead of which the states of Catalonia sent deputies to expostulate with him on the keeping so many Castilians about him; but he told them, that he employed none of his Castilians in public affairs; and that he would not be dictated to as to the servants who were about his person<sup>n</sup>. We have in another part of this work given an account of the share he had in the affairs of Castile, and therefore shall not mention them here. His brother the infant Don Juan, whom he had recalled in the beginning of his reign from Sicily, from an apprehension that mutinous people might have set him upon the throne, married about this time the queen dowager Donna Blanca, who was the heiress of Navarre, with the king's consent<sup>o</sup>. Don Alonso of Arragon, having obtained, by the assistance of pope Martin the fifth, a sufficient supply of money, executed his design of going in person to Sardinia, where, as he expected, he settled every thing to his own satisfaction, and obtained from the states of that island a free gift of one hundred thousand florins for the expences of his voyage, and to enable him to proceed to Sicily <sup>P</sup>, where his presence was become absolutely necessary.

A. D
1419.

<sup>k</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. MIGUEL CARBONEL, MAYERNE TURQUET, RAINALD. <sup>l</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. RAINALD. <sup>m</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MIGUEL CARBONEL, FERRAS. <sup>n</sup> HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, MARIANA, ZURITA. <sup>o</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment. FERRAS.

*Is adopted by Q. Joan of Naples,
and resolves to vindicate
his title by force of arms.*

A. D.
1420.

1421.

WHILE he was providing for this new expedition, Antonio Carracca applied to him on the behalf of queen Joan of Naples, against whom the pope, the duke of Anjou, and the constable Sforza, had entered into a confederacy to depose her, offering that she should adopt him for her son and heir, and give him immediately the duchy of Calabria, if he would assist her. The king, knowing that the duke of Anjou had entered into a treaty with the Genoese, accepted the proposal, and sent a stout body of troops to her relief, by whom the siege of Naples was raised; upon which the queen installed Don Alonso by proxy heir apparent of her kingdom, and duke of Calabria <sup>q</sup>. However, in his expedition against Corfica, the king of Arragon was not altogether so fortunate. The next year he went to Sicily, and, having assembled a great fleet and army, passed over to Naples, and made his entry into that city on the seventh of June, where he was very kindly received by the queen, who, notwithstanding, began to alter her sentiments in relation to the services done her by that prince, and to consider some way of revoking her adoption <sup>r</sup>. The pope, in point of dissimulation, fell not at all short of this princess; for some writers say, that he confirmed the adoption of Don Alonso; but all agree, that he caused several places in the territories of Naples to be delivered up to him, as heir of the kingdom, at the very time he was carrying on intrigues against him <sup>s</sup>. The king Don Alonso was in the mean time employed in reducing that part of the kingdom of Naples which still adhered to the duke of Anjou; and his success, which ought to have endeared him to the queen and her minister, served only to increase their hatred, from a persuasion that whatever augmented his power must lessen theirs <sup>t</sup>. The plague being at Naples, the king and queen retired to Gaeta, where the latter carried on her intrigues with the pope, the duke of Milan, and even her competitor Lewis duke of Anjou; of all which tho' the king was not ignorant, he took no sort of notice; but, as soon as Naples was free from the plague, he marched back thither by land with his forces, having appointed a squadron of galleys

<sup>P</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>q</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL, ALBINUS, PONTANUS, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>r</sup> ZURITA Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, MARIANA.

<sup>s</sup> RAINALD, MIGUEL CARBONEL.

<sup>t</sup> HIERONYMUS, BLANCHÉ Comment. FACIO, ÆN. Sylo. Sand. FERRERAS.

to transport the queen, who, surmising on the sudden, that those gallies might have orders to carry her to Spain, absolutely refused to go on board, and, with those who were about her, took shelter in the strong fortrefs of Capua; so that now the breach between the king and queen became public, though as yet there were no acts of hostility committed; on the contrary, both sides affected to give out, that their disputes were far from being irreconcilable; and that, upon a proper explanation, there was nothing more likely than that they should become good friends<sup>u</sup>.

THE queen, coming to Naples, took up her lodgings in one of the castles, the king of Arragon residing in another, all exterior marks of civility being still kept up between them. At length the queen having entered into an alliance with the powers before-mentioned, and procured a promise from the pope, that he would cancel her adoption of the king of Arragon, and confirm that she was about to make of Lewis, duke of Anjou, she judged the shortest and surest method of bringing this new scheme to bear, was to remove the king of Arragon secretly; in order to which, she sent her high steward to invite him to a conference. Don Alonso, having intelligence of the design, caused that lord to be arrested, and set out immediately to go to the conference which the queen had proposed; but when he drew near the castle, they not only refused him admittance, but discharged such a flight of arrows as wounded his horse in several places, and killed some of the nobility who were about him; which so provoked him, that he attacked and besieged it, though to no purpose<sup>v</sup>. By this means a civil war broke out in the very city of Naples, which lasted till the subjects of Don Alonso sent him such powerful assistance, that the queen was glad to escape, and leave him in possession of the capital; where he did not however remain long; but leaving his brother Don Pedro, who came with these succours, his viceroy, he embarked on board his fleet, in order to return to his hereditary dominions, and, in his passage, landed his troops, and made himself master of Marseilles; which though he suffered to be pillaged by his soldiers, yet he placed guards upon the churches, to protect the ladies who had taken refuge in them; and when, in return, they would have made him a valuable present out of the jewels which they had saved, he refused it, saying, that he revenged the injuries

Becomes master of the city, and constrains the queen to take shelter elsewhere.

A. D.
1423.

<sup>u</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL, ALBINUS, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MARIANA, FERRERAS.
<sup>v</sup> PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, FACIO, MARIANA.

he had received as a prince, and did not come thither to plunder<sup>x</sup>. It is necessary to remark, that at this time the city of Marseilles was in possession of the house of Anjou.

Returns
into his hereditary dominions,
without abandoning his claim to Naples.

A. D.
1425.

1427.

1429.

ONE of the principal reasons of the king of Arragon's returning home was, to procure the liberty of his brother the infant Don Henry, whom Don Juan of Castile had very justly imprisoned for the disturbances he had created in that kingdom, and of which, in speaking of the reign of that prince, we have given a large account. While this affair was depending, the infant Don Juan of Arragon became king of Navarre by the death of Charles the Noble, and, by his interposition, prevented a war from breaking out between the crowns of Castile and Arragon, and the liberty of his brother Don Henry. But, notwithstanding this, jealousies between these two monarchs continued, and even increased; insomuch that, Don Alonso of Arragon apprehending that some advantage might be taken of the count de Urgel's remaining a prisoner in Castile, he caused him to be taken from thence by force, and carried to the castle of Xativa<sup>y</sup>. Upon the death of Benedict the thirteenth, who, some writers say, was poisoned, the king of Arragon protected Giles Munoz, who had assumed the title of pope in opposition to Martin the fifth, whom he considered as his determined enemy; for which this last-mentioned pope caused him to be cited at Rome, with an intent to form a process against him; but it being the interest of neither to come to extremities, matters were at length compromised between them, and the king promised to use his endeavours with the pretended pope to lay aside that title, which he afterwards did<sup>z</sup>. The misunderstandings with Castile still continuing, the last-mentioned monarch entered into intrigues with some powerful subjects, who were discontented with the king Don Alonso, and amongst these was Don Alonso de Arguillo, archbishop of Saragossa; but, the conspiracy being discovered, most of them were arrested; however, only one suffered, who was beheaded; and this prelate, concerning whom there are many different reports, was never seen afterwards. Ferreras is very angry with a certain successor of his, for insinuating that it was not barely treason, but a treason of a kind not to be divulged, which induced the king to treat the archbishop with-so much severity. But if there had been nothing in this story, it is not easy to conceive the death of the primate of Arragon should not have drawn upon the king greater censure <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>x</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>y</sup> HERNANDO PEREZ DE GUZMAN, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, FERRERAS.

<sup>z</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. FERRERAS.

THE affairs of Don Alonso in Italy had declined from the time he left that country; and his brother the infant Don Pedro came in person to acquaint him how little hopes there were of retrieving them; which however did not hinder the king from sending such succours as he was able to those who still adhered to his interest <sup>b</sup>. At last, when things were almost grown desperate, and the duke of Anjou was become master of the best part of the kingdom of Naples, Don Alonso was surprised by an application from queen Joan and her high steward; who, on the part of the queen, represented to him, that she was very desirous of seeing him at Naples; and from the high steward, that he had a corps of six thousand horse and foot ready to join him as soon as his fleet should appear. The king sent a minister of his own to Rome, to learn the pope's disposition; to whom Martin the fifth very frankly declared, that he would give the king all the assistance in his power; upon which Don Alonso began to think in earnest of another expedition; for undertaking which he made vast preparations in the kingdom of Valentia. While he was thus employed, the pope died <sup>c</sup>, which gave him great uneasiness, but did not however intirely defeat his scheme, though he thought it prudent to give out that his armament was intended against the king of Tunis. When things were in proper order, the king appointed his consort regent of Catalonia, and gave his brother the king of Navarre the like authority in the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia <sup>d</sup>. The reader perhaps will not be displeased if we inform him, that, exclusive of the reasons assigned in history, an author <sup>e</sup> who may be depended upon acquaints us with the private but principal motive which induced this monarch to spend the remainder of his days in perpetual action and fatigue. He was one of the most graceful, as well as one of the most accomplished princes in Europe; and his queen Donna Maria of Castile was so jealous of him, that he found it impossible to live in peace. It is true that this was not without reason, since by one of

The true cause of his resolving to undertake another expedition into Italy.

<sup>a</sup> ABARCA, Historia de Espana, sec. 15.

CARBONEL, Æn. Sylv. Sand.

NUS, ALBINUS.

<sup>b</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL, Æn. Sylv. Sand. <sup>c</sup> RAINALD, PONTANUS, ALBINUS.

<sup>d</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>e</sup> Las Memorias de FELIPE DE COMINES, Confescolios propios de Don JUAN VITRIAN, P. 1. p. 3.

A. D. the ladies of her court he had a son Don Ferdinand; which 1431. provoked the queen to such a degree, that she put the lady to death; and this affected Don Alonso so much, that he resolved upon this method of dissipating his cares <sup>f</sup>.

He carries it into execution, and at length resolves, upon conquering Naples. THE king's fleet consisted of nine sail of ships of war, twenty-six gallies, and a great number of transports. His first exploit was attacking the island of Gerbes, upon the coast of Africa, where, on the first of September, he gained a decisive victory by land over the troops of the king of Tunis, took his tent with great riches therein, and twenty-five pieces of artillery, and, having reduced the island, and left a garrison there, proceeded to Sicily <sup>g</sup>. There he received an application from pope Eugenius the fourth, who was desirous that he should enter into a league with the Venetians and the Florentines; which he offered to do, provided he would grant him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, to which however the pontif would not consent <sup>h</sup>.

A. D. However, in the winter he made a new treaty with the queen 1432. of Naples, who promised to revoke all she had done in favour of the duke of Anjou, and to declare him her successor <sup>i</sup>. The next year passed intirely in negotiations, as did also part of the following, during which Lewis duke of Anjou died; and not long after the queen of Naples, notwithstanding all her treaties and all her professions, called his brother Rene to the succession, though he was at that time prisoner to the duke of Burgundy; however, he sent his consort Isabella, duchess of Anjou, to Naples, who, by the assistance of the pope, was received and treated as queen <sup>k</sup>. In the mean time the queen of Arragon, who had sent the infants Don Pedro and Don Henry to prevail on the king to return into his own dominions, but without effect, at length 1434. engaged Don Juan, king of Navarre, to make a voyage to Sicily for the same purpose, not doubting that, upon his representations, the king his brother would return, and <sup>l</sup>, from his own observations, be induced to remain.

Involves himself in a war with the

HE found Don Alonso absolutely bent upon attempting once more the conquest of Naples, and, with a fleet and army ready for that purpose, the king of Navarre and the infant Don Henry embarked with him; but the infant Don Pedro was left to command in Sicily. The duke of Sessa, Milan, the and some others of the king's party, made themselves masters of Capua, to which city the king and his brothers repaired; and, having held a council of war there with all the Neapolitan grandees in his interest, the siege of Gaeta was resolved on; and thither accordingly the king sailed with his fleet, with which he blocked up the place by sea<sup>a</sup>. Two brave men, Otho Zopo and Francisco Spinola, commanded in Gaeta for the duke of Milan, and the republic of Genoa, who found themselves under the necessity of turning out women, children, and other useless mouths, from within the place; whom the generals of the king of Arragon advised him to turn back, as a certain means of taking Gaeta quickly; however, Don Alonso received, relieved, and dismissed them, with this memorable expression, that he had much rather lose any city in his dominions than the reputation of humanity<sup>b</sup>. The Genoese sent a Squadron of twelve men of war and three gallies, commanded by Blaise Acereto, chancellor of the republic, exceedingly well manned and provided, to relieve the place. The king sent two gallies to bring him intelligence; and, as soon as he knew their strength, he sailed with fourteen ships of war and eleven gallies to meet and fight them. In three days he distinguished the Genoese fleet, and on Friday the fifth of August he engaged them. The chancellor Acereto brought only nine ships and three gallies into the line, giving orders to three of his stoutest ships to fall in upon any critical juncture, where they saw it necessary<sup>c</sup>. The Genoese, being better seamen, and their ships in all respects better furnished, had the advantage; and the king's ship was particularly very roughly handled; however, he would have made a tolerable retreat, if the three great men of war had not unexpectedly borne down, and in a few minutes distressed him to such a degree, that the ship was sinking; upon which, to save those who were with him, he caused his flag to be struck to the duke of Milan. The vessels that were near him followed his example, and, except a single ship, the whole fleet was taken<sup>d</sup>. This action lasted ten hours: there were about six hundred slain on the side of the king of Arragon, and about as many thousand taken prisoners, amongst whom were the kings of Arragon and

<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. FERRERAS. <sup>g</sup> ABARCA, MIGUEL CARBONEL, PONTANUS, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>h</sup> RAINALD, ZURITA, ALBINUS, BENEDICTI. <sup>i</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ COMMENT. ABARCA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>k</sup> FELIPE DE COMINES, PONTANUS, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>l</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA.

duke of Milan, the republic of Genoa, in which he is taken prisoner.

<sup>a</sup> ALBINUS, MIGUEL CARONEL, FACIO. <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> ABARCA, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>d</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCHÉ, ZURITA, ANNAL. Arragon. MARIANA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

Navarre, the infant Don Henry of Arragon, Don Juan de Soto Major, grand master, of the order of Alcantara, Don Diego Gomez de Sandoval, count de Castro, with his two sons Diego and Ferdinand, Don Ruy Diaz de Mendoca, surnamed the Bald, and the sons of Don Ruy Lopez de Avalos, with a multitude of other persons of distinction, Arragonefe, Valencians, and Catalonians; the prince of Tarente, duke of Sessa, the count de Campo Baso, and many others of the prime nobility of Naples<sup>9</sup>. The victory itself became in some measure a burden to those who gained it; insomuch that the chancellor Blaise Acereto, apprehensive of the consequences that might attend keeping such a number of prisoners on board the fleet, under colour of generosity set four thousand private men on shore the very next night, amongst whom many gentlemen escaped<sup>r</sup>.

Landed at Savona, and conducted by the duke's general to his capital at Milan.

UPON the news of this victory the siege of Gaeta was raised; but the chancellor of Genoa would not carry the fleet into that port, from an apprehension that the command would be immediately taken from him by Francis Spinola; he sailed therefore to the island of Ischia, and demanded of the king Don Alonso, that he should order the fortrefs and island to be put into his hands; but he answered, that he would not give a fort to prevent his throwing him into the sea; upon which the Genoese admiral returned to Savona, which at that time belonged to the duke of Milan, and there landed the two kings, and other persons of distinction; from thence they were carried to Porto Venere, where they were met by Nicholas Picinino, one of the duke's principal generals, who, with an escort of six hundred horse, conducted them to Milan, into which city the king of Arragon, and the rest of the great persons who were the companions of his misfortunes, made their public entry on the fifteenth of September: and thus ended the triumphs of the duke and the Genoese<sup>s</sup>.

The king draws over the duke of Milan, and engages him in a new alliance.

GREAT trials and sudden changes of fortune are the true tests of abilities. The fifth of August was not the most unfortunate, the fifteenth of September was the most happy, of this monarch's life. The duke of Milan, from a point of generosity worthy of so great a prince, treated the king of Arragon with equal magnificence and respect; but what at first was mere complaisance and generosity, became very quickly something more. The very ceremonies of his reception were hardly over, when the king of Arragon told the duke, that he was amazed they should be enemies, whose empires and whose interests were the same: he said, that, in referring the neighbourhood of the duke of Anjou to that of a king of Arragon, he acted wisely, and like a politician, but that he ought to consider, that, if a French prince became once king of Naples, it would be a conquest made for France, who would not fail to pour in troops through Piedmont and the state of Genoa; by which they would soon have Lombardy at their mercy, and consequently he, who was now the protector of the duke of Anjou, would be in great danger of becoming the king of Naples's vassal. The duke was struck with this observation very much, more especially when the king added, that these were always the sentiments of John Gallias his father, which the chief counsellors of the duke confirmed. The consequence of this was, that within a few weeks the duke of Milan changed sides, and entered into a treaty offensive and defensive with the king of Arragon, against all the princes in the world, the pope not excepted; with which news the king of Navarre was sent away into Spain, and the king of Arragon, his brother the infant, and the Italian princes, after receiving rich presents and the highest honours, were dismissed without ransom; which happy turn in his affairs the king knew so well how to second by his instructions to his generals, that, upon Christmas-day in the same year, the infant Don Pedro became master of Gaeta, and thereby opened a passage to the conquest of the whole kingdom of Naples<sup>a</sup>. The republic of Genoa could not at all relish this signal act of generosity, but took advantage from thence to revolt from the duke of Milan, and to declare war both against him and his new ally w.

<sup>9</sup> ALBINUS, PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. MARIANA. <sup>r</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>s</sup> ALBINUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

THE news of the king's captivity, and that of his brother the king of Navarre, made a great noise in Spain, more especially as the affairs of Arragon were not at that time in the best condition, the disputes with Castile remaining yet unsettled. The queen Donna Maria acted upon this occasion with a prudence so much the more laudable, as it was scarce to have been expected from her sex, and under so much affliction. She dispatched a herald at arms immediately

States of Arragon; Valentia, and Catalonia, viz with each other in granting him supplies.

<sup>a</sup> ABARCA, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, FERRERAS.

<sup>b</sup> ALBINUS, FACIO, MARINA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>c</sup> ABARCA, ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, FERRERAS.

<sup>w</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

with letters to the king her husband, and assembled as soon as possible the states of Arragon at Saragossa; upon which occasion they shewed the true spirit of a free people; for they advised her to call a general assembly of the states of Arragon, Valentia, Catalonia, and Majorca, in some convenient place, and took upon themselves to dispense with the usual formalities, alleging, that they were contrived only to guard against the royal prerogative, from which they had now nothing to fear*. The queen fixed upon Moncon; to which place the deputies resorted, and took all the steps necessary for the security of their respective kingdoms; after which the queen had an interview with her brother Don Juan of Castile, who, at her request, prolonged the truce†. While the states were contriving how to procure the sum necessary for the king's ransom, the king of Navarre very unexpectedly arrived, and laid before them the surprising alteration of that monarch's circumstances, and his earnest desire that they would afford him such a supply as his exigencies required. The states at this time were at Alcariz; but, upon receiving this information, they immediately separated, those of Valentia retiring to Morella, and those of Catalonia to Tortosa, that they might make their levies with the greater ease‡. As for the states of Arragon, they remained where they were; and, to give a good example, granted the king one hundred and twenty thousand florins; in Valentia they gave him one hundred thousand, and the like sum in Catalonia, where they ordered it to be laid out in fitting out a great fleet under the command of the count de Medica§. Thus the king was in all respects a gainer by his defeat before Gaeta, and was himself amazed at the receiving of succours, which nothing could have procured but the surprize attending such a misfortune, happily improved by the application and address of the queen Donna Maria.

A. D.
1436.

His hereditary dominions suffer many inconveniencies in his absence.

THIS part of the war in Italy has so close a connection with the affairs of Arragon, and it was so necessary to explain the reason of Don Alonso's continuing in that country that we could not avoid entering into the particulars; but if the reader is inclined to pursue the history of this war farther, he will find it under the history of Naples, to which it properly belongs. Don Alonso being accounted from thence.

* ABARCA, ZURITA, MARIANA.

PEREZ DE GUZMAN, MAYERNE TURQUET.

RITA, Anna<sup>l</sup>. Arragon.

PERAS.

† HERNAND

‡ ZU

§ ABARCA, MARIANA, FER

time king of that country, the possession of which not without great difficulty he acquired by his arms; and tho', being often pressed, he sometimes promised to return to his hereditary dominions, yet it never seems to have been his intention, and perhaps he was as little inclined to draw the queen thither, though he sometimes requested it, and particularly when he sent for his natural son Don Ferdinand, who, notwithstanding her severity to his mother, the queen caused to be educated with great care <sup>b</sup>. As for the king of Navarre, and the infant Don Henry, they were wholly intent on promoting their interests in Castile, where they had the displeasure of hearing that the infant Don Pedro had lost his life before Naples; and, what added to their trouble, the duke of Anjou procured a great body of adventurers to make an irruption into Arragon, which however produced little <sup>c</sup>. On the other hand, the success of Don Alonso alarmed the Italian princes so much, that a league was formed against him by the pope, the duke of Milan, the count of Sforza, the Venetians, Florentines, and Genoese; notwithstanding which, he became the very next year master of Naples, and broke that confederacy to pieces <sup>d</sup>.

A. D.
1442.

THE ensuing year was still more glorious for Don Alonso; Becomes the inhabitants of most of the provinces of which the king-sole and dom of Naples was composed, being weary of the miseries of war, submitted themselves willingly to that prince, who, by the advice of some of his best friends, resolved to call together the states general of the whole kingdom, which he did at Beneventum, from whence, at their own request, they were transferred to the capital city of Naples, into which the king made a public entry, very little inferior to that of a Roman triumph; the prelates and clergy preceding his chariot, before which was led a white horse richly caparisoned, the chariot being drawn by four horses of the same colour, being open, and very richly gilt, in which was the king alone, followed by all the princes and nobility of the kingdom on foot <sup>e</sup>. What added a lustre to the ceremony was, the unaffected modesty of the king, who did not wear either diadem or crown, but behaved towards every body with so much ease, and yet with so much dignity, that he was beloved in the same degree he was admired. In this assembly

<sup>b</sup> ALBINUS, ZURITA, MAYERNE TURQUET. <sup>c</sup> Las Memorias de FELIPE DE COMINES, &c. FERRERAS. <sup>d</sup> PON-TANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, BENEDICTI, ALBINUS, PANOR-MITA, MARIANA. <sup>e</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon, ALBINUS, PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARBONEL, &c.

1443.

of the states, his son Don Ferdinand, whom he had created duke of Calabria, was acknowledged successor to the crown; and the king created marquisses and counts; tho' their number was considerable enough before<sup>f</sup>. He was now reconciled to the duke of Milan, by whose interposition he concluded a peace with pope Eugenius, and who negotiated a marriage for his natural daughter Donna Maria with Lionel d'Este duke of Ferrara<sup>g</sup>. This disoblged Francis Picinini, the son of Nicholas, who had rendered the king great services during the war, and who had flattered himself with the hopes of marrying this princess by way of reward, and who, finding himself disappointed, quitted his dominions in twenty-four hours<sup>h</sup>. Towards the end of the year, two very considerable officers in his service, Broylo de Mure and Pietro Brunoro, formed a project of seizing his person, in hopes of being gratified by count Sforza; but the plot being discovered when it was almost ripe for execution, the king seized and sent them into Arragon, where they remained for many years prisoners in the castle of Xativa. The duke of Milan, whose son-in-law count Sforza was, and who had hitherto lived upon bad terms with him, now thought fit to grant him his protection, and pressed the king to desist from making war<sup>i</sup>.

Gives law, and is esteemed the great arbiter
of war and peace through all Italy.

THE continuance of his good fortune augmented, instead of extinguishing, the envy of his neighbours; but though it gave him some disturbance, the loss fell upon them, and the king carried his point. The pope was obliged to grant him the investiture of Naples, which he had so often refused. He likewise legitimated his son, which, tho' a point of complaisance in him, was however very convenient to the king, since it took away all doubt about the right of succession; for Naples being held as a fief of the see of Rome, the pope, by this act of favour, removed the single advantage that himself and his successors might have taken against him<sup>k</sup>. About the same time this young prince was married to Isabella de Clermont, niece to the prince of Tarento; and, to crown his felicity, the Genoese, who had hated him so heartily, and from whom he had received so much hurt, were constrained to demand his protection<sup>l</sup>. His subjects in Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, regretted his absence extremely, as they gave him frequently to understand, tho' at the same time

<sup>f</sup> ABARCA, ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.
Annal. Arragon. MAYERNE TURQ.

<sup>g</sup> ZUR.

<sup>h</sup> ALBINUS, PONTANUS, MIGUEL CARB. FERR.

<sup>i</sup> ABARCA, MAR.

<sup>k</sup> RAINALD. ZUR. Annal. Arragon. MAR.

<sup>l</sup> ALBINUS, PONT.

FACIO, ABARCA.

they persisted steadily in their duty, of which they gave him many substantial marks. His brother Don Juan, king of Navarre, tho' not a little opinionated, often demanded his advice, which he did not often follow; for Don Alonso always recommended a good understanding with the king of Castile, to whom he sent several embassies; and though he could not prevent his brother's taking contrary measures, yet he hindered, in a great measure, the bad consequences that might have attended them, and enabled the queen Donna Maria to remain always on good terms with her brother. He excited a spirit in the states of Arragon, that enabled him to controul Don Juan of Navarre in those violent measures he took in regard to his son the prince of Viana, and in his intrigues with the malecontents of Castile, with which crown a solid peace was on the point of being concluded, when the king Don Juan of Castile died. This was actually concluded with his successor Don Henry upon the very terms that Alonso desired <sup>m</sup>, and, during his life, punctually kept on both sides.

1455.<sup>1</sup>

As the flower, so the decline, of his age was spent in the hurry of negotiations, political intrigues, and the din of arms; neither were they without some disagreeable scenes and uneasy apprehensions. His nephew Don Carlos, prince of Viana, after having sustained a war against his father Don Juan, and suffered a tedious imprisonment, was at length compelled to retire to Naples, in hopes of enjoying some repose under the shadow of his protection. Don Alonso received him with a generosity worthy of so great a prince, and the tender affection that might be expected from so near a relation <sup>n</sup>. His cousin the duke of Calabria, either in imitation of his father, or from a principle of compassion, shewed him all the respect and kindness imaginable; so that he enjoyed, while he remained with them, all the happiness that it was in their power to bestow, and, through their mediation, things were compromised to his satisfaction with the king his father <sup>o</sup>; but afterwards the flame burst out with greater violence than ever, the people of Navarre having proclaimed him king, by which the civil war was renewed; which so provoked the king Don Juan, that he disinherited him and one of his sisters <sup>p</sup>.

*But meets with troubles and disappointments,
which im-bitter the decline of his life.*

<sup>m</sup> HERN. PEREZ DE GUZM. ZURIT. FERRER. <sup>n</sup> MIG. CARB. ABARCA, MAYERNE TURQ. <sup>o</sup> ZURIT. Annal. Arragon. <sup>p</sup> ABARCA, FERRERAS, MAYERNE TURQUET.

His death,
at which he bequeaths
the kingdom of Naples to his natural son Don Ferdin-
and.

DON Alonso, having prevailed on his nephew to leave all things to his decision, dispatched one of his ministers to the king Don Juan, who came at the critical conjuncture when things were on the point of being determined by a battle; but he executed his commission with such firmness and dexterity, that the king of Navarre consented to admit his brother's mediation, to declare all his proceedings against his son null and void, and to leave the terms of pacification to be settled as that monarch should think fit. At this time, tho' he had conquered many difficulties, and had united his old antagonist Francis Sforza, now duke of Milan, to his interests, by the marriage of his grandson to the duke's daughter, and his grand-daughter to the duke's son, yet fresh sources of trouble broke out. Pope Calixtus II. tho' born his subject, was not well-affected to him, and the Neapolitans in general disliked the duke of Calabria, who was of a cloudy and reserved disposition, and had nothing of that easy address and natural affability, which had contributed more to his father's success than either his courage or his abilities; in which, however, few princes were his equals. But what troubled Don Alonso most was the discovery that some of the principal nobility of his kingdom had tampered with his nephew Don Carlos, who had not given so clear and direct an answer as the obligations he was under both to the father and son required. This affected the king so much, that he fell into a fever; and Don Carlos, suspecting the cause, very prudently withdrew into Sicily, while the king, restless and uneasy, caused himself to be carried from one castle in Naples to another, and at length expired on the 22d day of June, 1468, in the 43d year of his reign over Arragon, and the countries dependent upon that crown.

The character of Don Alonso.

THE character of Don Alonso V. of Arragon, and the first of Naples, having long ago exercised, as a certain author reports, the pens of more than threescore eminent historians, stands not at all in need of any thing we can say; and yet there are certain circumstances that, for the satisfaction of our readers, ought not to be omitted. He was, beyond all doubt, the greatest prince that ever sat upon the throne of Arragon; a very able statesman, and one who did his business directly; disdaining, as became him, whatever looked like cunning; a gallant soldier, and a great captain, perfectly skilled in the art of war, which he managed openly, and without cruelty; learned himself, and the greatest pa-

2 ZURIT. Annal. Arragon. MAR.
3 VARILL. Anecdotes de Florence.

4 MAR. FERRER.

tron of learning that age produced. He gave for his device a book opened; and it was his common saying, that an unlettered prince was but a crowned ass. He had, with many and great virtues, some vices, which, however, regarded rather his private than his public life. The greatest of his failings was his love of women, which was fatal to Donna Margarita de Hija; the mother of Don Ferdinand, and who was big with child by him, when she became the victim of his queen's jealousy<sup>1</sup>. He had, besides, a Neapolitan mistress, who made much more noise in the world, and whom some say he was inclined to marry. Her name was Lucretia Alania, and his fondness for her in a very advanced period of life sullied his reputation very much<sup>u</sup>. He died, however, with great marks of penitence, declaring, by his last testament, his brother Don Juan, king of Navarre, heir to the crowns of Arragon, Valentia, Majorca, Sardinia, and Sicily, and the principality of Catalonia, with all their dependencies<sup>w</sup>. The kingdom of Naples, acquired by his arms, and to which he had a personal, not an hereditary right, he bestowed on Don Ferdinand Duke of Calabria. Besides this natural son, he left behind him two daughters, Donna Maria marchioness of Ferrara, and Donna Leonora princess of Rossano, and duchess of Sessa. His death falling out as it did, saved the republic of Genoa, which was on the very point of being overwhelmed by his arms<sup>x</sup>, and furnished new matter for intrigues to all the refined politicians in Italy.

As soon as the news of the king's death reached Arragon, Don Juan Don Juan II. was acknowledged and proclaimed king at Saragossa on the 25th of July<sup>y</sup>. His first care was to appoint his daughter, the countess of Foix, vice-queen of Navarre, and to send Don Lope Ximenes de Urrea, with the title of viceroy, into Sicily, where he was apprehensive that his son, the prince of Viana, would have created some disturbances; but Don Carlos removed that fear by his letters, in which he declared he was willing to reside in any part of his father's dominions that he should assign him; which gave him great satisfaction, though he could not presently resolve where to place him<sup>z</sup>. On the fourth of September, the same year, died at Valencia Donna Maria, queen dowager of Arragon<sup>a</sup>. In the succeeding month of November, the king went to Catalonia, where he confirmed the privileges of the inhabitants;

II. succeeds to the hereditary dominions, and the queen dowager dies soon after.

<sup>1</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET Histoire General d'Espagne, liv. xx.

<sup>u</sup> ZURIT. FERRER.

<sup>w</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>x</sup> ALBINUS.

<sup>y</sup> ZUR. Annal. Arragon.

<sup>z</sup> HIERON. BLANCÆ Comment.

<sup>a</sup> FERR.

and the next spring he did the same at Valencia <sup>b</sup>. The prince Don Carlos, by his command, quitted Sicily, and came to Majorca. During his residence there, a treaty was concluded between him and his father, by which the prince gave up all that was held by his partisans in Navarre, and, on the other hand, he was permitted to live in any part of his father's dominions, excepting that kingdom and in Sicily; in consequence of which also he was restored to his father's favour, such as had been imprisoned on his account were set at liberty, her appenage restored to his sister Donna Blanca, and the revenues of his principality of Viana secured to him <sup>c</sup>. This treaty thus concluded, the prince quitted Majorca, and went to Barcelona, where he made the deepest submission possible to the king his father, and to the queen his mother-in-law Donna Juana, daughter to the Amirante of Castile; and thus, in appearance, all past disputes were buried in oblivion; but as children often fall out with their parents, so it seldom falls out that these differences are thoroughly healed <sup>d</sup>. The king held the states of Arragon at Fraga, where it was expected that he should have caused the prince Don Carlos to be acknowledged for his successor: as he did not, it occasioned some murmurs; to silence which, he united the kingdoms of Sicily and Sardinia for ever to the crown of Arragon <sup>e</sup>. He went from thence to Lerida, where he held the states of Catalonia, where, tho' he managed things with great dexterity, yet he could not hinder the Catalans from proposing that the infant Don Carlos should be acknowledged for his successor; but he found means to elude that proposition after it was made, and at length dissolved that assembly, without giving them any definitive answer. It was not long, however, before this troublesome affair created fresh confusion, which issued at length in a very melancholy catastrophe, which it is necessary for us to relate, and which we shall endeavour to do as clearly and succinctly as possible, tho' there are few points in the Spanish history, about which authors are more divided in their opinions, or indeed with a greater shew of reason on both sides.

Quarrel between
that king
and his son the prince of Viana.

THE king of Portugal had proposed to D. Juan of Arragon a match between the prince of Viana and the infanta Catalina, or Catherine, of Portugal, with which the king seemed to be pleased, and to which the prince shewed no dislike. But the ambassadors sent by Don Henry of Castile to the court of Arragon found means to acquaint the prince, in their master's

<sup>b</sup> HIERON. BLANCÆ Comment.

<sup>c</sup> MIGUEL CARB.

<sup>d</sup> ZURIT. Annal. Arragon.

<sup>e</sup> MARIAN.

<sup>f</sup> FERR.

name, that he should not trouble himself about the hard usage he met with, since their master was desirous he should marry the infanta Donna Isabella, his sister; in consideration of which marriage, he would maintain his rights, and set him upon the throne by force. The prince, who saw but too much reason to doubt of his father's intentions towards him, did not reject this proposition, but gave a general answer, which the Castilian ambassadors might interpret as they pleased <sup>g</sup>. It was not long before the admiral of Castile obtained intelligence of this treaty, and gave notice of it to the queen of Arragon, who laboured to persuade the king that this was little better than a contrivance to dethrone him. When her arguments failed of persuading, she had recourse to tears; and the old king, to quiet her, promised to arrest his son, and keep him in prison. To seize him at Barcelona was impossible; he sent for him therefore to Lerida; and though the prince was told what his father's intentions were, yet nothing could prevent his going; notwithstanding which the king caused him to be seized in his presence, and to be afterwards transferred from prison to prison, as if he had been guilty of some great crime; and, which was worse, he gave out that the prince had conspired against his life <sup>h</sup>. The states of Arragon remonstrated upon this; the states of Catalonia did more; they demanded the prince's liberty, and that he should be declared heir apparent; and they raised a numerous army, and fitted out a good fleet to procure it <sup>i</sup>. The king Don Juan armed on his side; but the queen grew afraid, desired her husband to set the prince at liberty, and to comply with their demands; to which he consented, and she had the credit of it. The states of Catalonia thanked her for it by their deputies; but they would not suffer her to come with the prince to Barcelona, and the king found himself obliged to leave the whole principality of Catalonia in his hands <sup>k</sup>; but, as if he intended to shew how much this was against his will, he entered into a treaty with the king of Castile, whom he easily engaged to abandon and betray his son, and committed to prison a gentleman whom he had sent to execute a commission of some importance to them both; which behaviour, as it manifested an irreconcilable aversion, affected the prince to such a degree, that he fell into a slow fever, of which he died at Barcelona, on Wednesday September the 23d, 1461, in the 41st year of his age.

*His imprisonment
and death.*

<sup>g</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL.

<sup>h</sup> ZURIT. Annal. Arragon.

<sup>i</sup> MIG. CARBONEL.

<sup>k</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment.

ment.

Some particulars of this young prince's life and character.

THIS prince was highly remarkable for his great qualities and his extensive learning, and still more for his misfortunes. He was certainly intitled to the crown of Navarre, of which his mother was the heiress. His courage, his modesty, and his steady adherence to his friends, made him generally beloved. He was a great master of antient literature, as appears from his writing a commentary on the Ethics of Aristotle. He composed likewise a history of Navarre. He was a great admirer of poetry, and delighted principally in the conversation of men of letters. He gave for his device two mastiffs snarling over a bone; and sometimes told his friends that bone was the kingdom of Navarre, which sometimes felt the teeth of Castile, and sometimes those of France. On his death-bed he desired his father's pardon, and, by his testament, bequeathed the kingdom of Navarre to his sister Donna Blanca. His favourites would have persuaded him to have married his mistress Donna Brianda Vaca; but he refused it, probably out of respect to his sister. He left by that lady two sons, Don Philip count of Beaufort, Don Juan Alonso, and a daughter Donna Ines, or Anne of Navarre<sup>a</sup>. It was generally believed that he was poisoned; and that the poison was given him by a physician at the instance of the queen his mother-in-law, while he was confined<sup>a</sup>. He was so intirely beloved by the people of Barcelona, that they believed miracles were wrought at his tomb. Their resentment of his ill usage ran so high, that they were strongly inclined to set up for a free state; and to this they were not a little encouraged by Lewis XI. of France. We will end this subject by observing, that the infanta Donna Catalina of Portugal entered into the convent of Santa Clara at Lisbon as soon as she heard of the prince's death. A point of honour very common amongst princesses in those days, but intirely voluntary, and might be omitted without reproach<sup>o</sup>.

The Catalonians revolt against their king, out of hatred to the queen Donna Juana.

As the queen Donna Juana was a princess of infinite dexterity and address, she prevailed, notwithstanding these prejudices, on the states of Catalonia to acknowledge her son Don Ferdinand for the legal successor, and to take the oaths to him, considered in that light. The people, however, were intractable; insomuch that a general insurrection ensued, partly owing to the indiscretion of the queen, who encouraged the peasants in a certain district to throw off the yoke of their lords; which disgusted all the nobility, and the queen found herself obliged to retire with her son to Gironne, where she

* MIGUEL CARRONEL.
Annals

<sup>a</sup> Idem.

• ZURITA

was soon after besieged by the rebels P. In the mean time the king Don Juan, being in great want of money, entered into a treaty with Lewis XI. of France, to whom he mortgaged the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne for 200,000 crowns; and by the help of this money, and with the assistance of French troops, raised the siege. He not long after seized his daughter Donna Blanca, carried her by force over the Pyrenees, and put her into the hands of the count and countess of Foix, who, though they were her nearest relations, were her bitterest enemies. That unfortunate princess wrote to the king of Castile for assistance, to whom she bequeathed her right to the kingdom of Navarre. She was imprisoned for about two years in a castle in Bearn, and then poisoned. In the mean time the Catalans still continued in arms, and, as we have already shewn, offered their principality to the king of Castile, proclaimed him at Barcelona, and procured succours from him several times, till he was prevailed upon to leave all disputes with the crown of Arragon to Lewis XI. of France, who declared these proceedings void. The Catalans then called in Don Pedro of Portugal, under whom they continued the war, though with no great success, the king gaining several advantages over them, and particularly a battle on the last of January, in which several persons of distinction were taken prisoners. The credit of this was given to the infant Don Ferdinand, though some writers say that he was no otherwise intitled to it than by being in the rear of the army. This was followed by the loss of many places of importance; and, on the 29th of June, in the year following, the infant Don Pedro died, leaving his claim to the principality of Catalonia, which arose from his mother, descended from the count d'Urgel, to the infant Don Juan. This, however, had little effect; for, on the one hand, the king reduced Tortosa, and, on the other, the Catalans called in Rene duke of Anjou, and his son John duke of Lorraine, as being descended from a house that once set up a claim to the crown of Arragon.

1465.

1466.

THE duke of Anjou was then so far in years, that he was in a manner superannuated; but as ambition is the last inclination subdued by princes, so this application of the people of Catalonia revived him as it were from the grave; and tho' himself, like the rest of his family, had been hitherto unfor-

Great actions and death of that princess, and

P FERRERAS.

MINES.

FELIPE DE COMINES.

BLAN. Comment.

Las Memorias de FELIPE DE CO-

F HIERON. BLAN.

ZURIT. Annal.

Las Memorias de

HIERON.

what she is reported to have said on her death-bed.

fortunate in all his pretensions, yet he exerted himself to the utmost in raising forces, which were embarked for Catalonia under the command of his son John duke of Lorrain <sup>w</sup>. The king of Arragon, foreseeing that this affair would give him a great deal of trouble, solicited assistance from all quarters; and, tho' he was very old and infirm, put himself at the head of his armies, and shewed great spirit and experience in the conduct of the war; for the maintenance of which the people of Barcelona spent without reluctance that immense wealth which they had gained by their commerce <sup>x</sup>. On the other hand, the queen was no less active; and though many princesses have, like her, entered into their husbands councils, yet there are few examples of their commanding an army as she did. What is still more extraordinary, she formed the project of embarking troops, in order to besiege Roses; which, however, she found it not easy to reduce: after which she made a tour into the county of Foix, where she regulated several points of importance in regard to the kingdom of Navarre. These fatigues, however, became at last too great for her constitution; so that, finding herself indisposed, she retired to Tarragona, where, after a long illness, she breathed her last on the 13th of February, in the year 1468 <sup>y</sup>. In her last moments, it is said, she exclaimed with great passion, My son, my son, Ferdinand, how dear has thy greatness cost me! Some authors pretend, that she acknowledged the death of the infant Don Carlos; and that when the king Don Juan was informed of it, he expressed the greatest horror and detestation of the fact imaginable <sup>z</sup>. He was, not long after, in great danger of being taken prisoner by the duke of Lorrain, who took all his baggage, and afterwards formed the siege of Gironne <sup>a</sup>. The king then went to Saragossa, where he held an assembly of the states, in which he declared his son Don Ferdinand king of Sicily, and his coadjutor in the throne of Arragon. The same year Don Juan, who had been some years almost blind by cataracts on both eyes, was cured by a Jew, and recovered his sight <sup>b</sup>.

The Catalans, notwithstanding her death, persist ob-

THERE wanted not many who thought the death of the queen would be very detrimental to the king's affairs; but it proved quite otherwise; for the people had been accustomed to attribute most of the violences in his reign to the ascendancy she had over him; and it quickly appeared that the people are not always mistaken in their sentiments. The

<sup>w</sup> ZURIT. Annal.
Annal.
Comment.

<sup>x</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL.

<sup>y</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>z</sup> MIGUEL CARBONEL.

<sup>a</sup> HIERON. BLANC.

<sup>b</sup> ZUR.

king assembled a good army for the relief of Gironne, before stinately in which the duke of Lorrain lay with an army of 15,000 men; their re- but when the troops of Arragon drew near the place, they bellion. found it had already surrendered: upon this the king quitted the command of the army, and retired with a small body of troops, in order to enjoy the pleasure of hunting<sup>c</sup>. Don Ferdinand king of Sicily, finding himself at the head of an army, was prevailed upon by some of his favourites to attempt surprising the duke of Lorrain, who being a brave and a better soldier than himself, beat him thoroughly, and would have made a great use of this victory, if the old king had not advanced to Urgel, and thereby hindered his son's troops from flying farther<sup>d</sup>. When both armies were gone into winter-quarters, the count de Foix made an irruption into Navarre, against whom Don Juan was obliged to march; but matters were quickly compromised. What gave him more trouble than all these, was his extreme want of money, his treasury being in a manner exhausted by the presents and subsidies which were requisite for promoting his son's marriage with the infanta Donna Isabella. He found means, however, to fit out a good fleet, in order to intercept the enemy's succours; and, by the sale of some places to the prelates and clergy, he was in some measure delivered from his distress<sup>e</sup>. His subjects in Sicily, and his nephew Don Ferdinand sent him also assistance.

1469

ABOUT the middle of May in the next year, the king assembled the states of Catalonia at Moncon, where things Are de- passed rather better than he expected; however, nothing seated in a decisive happened in the campaign; and, in September, when general he came to hold the states of Arragon at Saragossa, they action by granted him all that he demanded; so that he found himself Don Juan, in a condition to put a good army on foot against the ensu- with a ing spring<sup>f</sup>. On the 16th of December the duke of Lorrain consider- died at Barcelona; and, in his last moments, advised the able loss. Catalans to make their peace with the king Don Juan; which, however, they refused to do, and employed a considerable sum of money in hiring Italian and French troops for their own defence<sup>g</sup>. Nicholas, the eldest son of the duke of Lorrain, little regarding his father's dying admonition, assumed the title of king of Arragon, notwithstanding that the major part of the inhabitants of Barcelona were inclined to submit

1470

<sup>c</sup> HIERON. BLANCÆ Comment.<sup>d</sup> ZURITA Annales.<sup>e</sup> MIGUEL CARBON.<sup>f</sup> MARIANA.<sup>g</sup> HIERON.

ubi supra.

to the French <sup>b</sup>. The king Don Juan reduced Gironne, and several other places; but ran a very great risk at the siege of Peralada, where the count of Campo Baso, at the head of a corps of mercenaries, broke into his camp in the night, and forced the old king to save his life by flying on horseback, without any thing on but his shirt: he returned, however, the next day to the siege, and carried the place <sup>i</sup>. The inhabitants of Perpignan also cut the throats of the French garrison in the night, and opened their gates to the king's troops <sup>k</sup>. The rebellion was now in a manner confined within the walls of Barcelona, and the king gave orders to his natural son Don Alonso of Arragon, and the count of Prades, to block up that city, in hopes it would produce a treaty; but the rebels, grown desperate, and provoked by the scarcity of provisions, ordered their generals, Don Denis of Portugal, and James Galeot, to march out and attack the king's forces <sup>l</sup>. This engagement happened on the fifth of November, and at the very beginning the Catalans gave way; however, about 4000 remaining firm, Don Alonso and the count de Prades surrounded and cut them and their two generals to pieces; and soon after, the count de Prades defeated the count de Campo Baso, and his Italians. In all probability, the king had put an end to the war, if he had not been obliged to attend to the affairs of Navarre, and to those of his son Don Ferdinand, whose marriage with Donna Isabella required continual supplies of money <sup>m</sup>, since his business could not otherwise advance in a corrupt court.

1471. Barcelona, after a most gallant defence, surrenders, but prescribes its own terms.

In the ensuing spring, Don Ferdinand came to make his father a visit, and found him employed in the siege of Barcelona, which was carried on both by land and sea. The pope's legate cardinal Borgia came thither also, and had an audience of the king <sup>n</sup>. In the mean time Lewis the eleventh of France, and the duke of Lorraine, made various efforts in order to raise the siege of Barcelona, but without effect. At length things were brought to such an extremity that the besieged had nothing to hope, when the king offered to receive them all to his mercy, to confirm their privileges, to bury in eternal oblivion all that was past, and not to punish any of them either in person or in property; which terms they rejected, chiefly by the influence of the count de Pailhars, whom he had pardoned the year before <sup>o</sup>. The army, on the other hand, was very earnest in being led on to the

<sup>b</sup> MARIANA.
FELIPE DE COMINES.

<sup>c</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>i</sup> ZURITA.

<sup>l</sup> ZURITA Annal.

<sup>o</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>k</sup> Las Memorias de
<sup>m</sup> Idem ib.

assault, in hopes of having the plunder of the place. The king, upon this, wrote a letter to the citizens, dated the 6th of October, in terms as tender and as affectionate as if they had been his children, bewailing the miseries they had brought on themselves, and concluding with a protestation, that they, and not he, must be answerable for future events. Upon this, at the persuasion of a priest, who had the reputation of sanctity, they sent their deputies to the king, and made a capitulation on the 17th of the same month; in which the king took all upon himself, acknowledged they took arms upon just motives, and pardoned every body, the count de Pailbars excepted, who, however, was suffered to escape P. 1472. On the 22d, the king made his public entry into the city, and confirmed their privileges &c. The same year a marriage was concluded between Don Frederick, the second son of Don Ferdinand king of Naples, and the infanta Donna Joanna of Arragon &c.

THE inhabitants of Perpignan and Elnè having massacred the French garrisons, in order to put themselves again under the obedience of the king of Arragon, began to be very apprehensive of the vengeance of Lewis XI. who was assembling a great army, on purpose to chastize them. The king came in person to direct the new fortifications of Perpignan, and brought with him his son Don Alonso of Arragon, the counts of Cardona and Prades, and several other officers of distinction, who omitted nothing that could be devised for the security of the place &c. When the strength of the enemy was thoroughly known, they intreated the king to retire; but Don Juan, having observed consternation in the countenances of the inhabitants, called a general assembly in the great church, where he told them, that he knew very well the character of the prince they had offended, and the danger to which they were exposed; that they could be only safe by a vigorous defence; and, to encourage them to this, laying his hand suddenly on the gospels, he swore he would remain with them, and undergo all the fatigues of the siege &c. The place was presently invested by a numerous army, under the command of Philip count of Bresse. The Catalans no sooner received advice of this, than, forgetting their former disposition, they took arms every-where throughout the principality, and sent deputies to desire Don Ferdinand king of Sicily to come and put himself at their head. That prince,

P HIER. BLANCHE Comment.    ZURITA.    MARIAN.
 Las Memorias de FELIPE DE COMINES.    MAYERNE TURQUET.

ever famous for his prudence, would have excused himself from the perplexed state of his own affairs; but Donna Isabella, and the archbishop of Toledo, told him, that his duty required him to forget all things but the danger of his father and his king. He set out therefore immediately for Barcelona, where he found an army of 25,000 men in complete order, and ready to march.

Are gloriously defended in two sieges by the old king, who forces the enemy to raise both.

THE king Don Juan defended Perpignan with a steadiness that exceedingly perplexed the French, and notwithstanding a circumstance very extraordinary, which was that the citadel was yet in their hands. Their army was at first near forty thousand men; but by Midsummer, when Don Ferdinand passed the Pyrenees, they thought themselves too weak to continue the siege, and therefore set fire to their camp, and retired w. The old king marched out with his garrison to meet and embrace his son, who in a few days followed the French with his army, but found them so well intrenched that he did not think fit to attack them. Upon their motion a truce was concluded for a time; upon which Don Ferdinand returned with his troops to Barcelona, where he dismissed the greatest part of them *. On the other hand, Lewis XI. after bestowing the bitterest reproaches upon his generals, cancelled the truce, and, having reinforced the army with 10,000 men, sent them back to see if they could take Perpignan, now there was no army to relieve it. The king Don Juan was still there, when the place was a second time invested; and, finding himself pushed hard, he caused a report to be spread, that the great cities behind the French army had revolted, and were marching with a great force to attack them in their trenches; upon which they raised the siege a second time, and he handled their rear-guard so roughly, that there was no bringing them to look at Perpignan any more †. On this Lewis XI. thought fit to send a minister to negotiate a peace, which, both parties being heartily weary of the war, was very speedily concluded, upon easy and reasonable terms ‡. The king Don Juan, returning thro' Catalonia, was received with the loudest acclamations, and those who had been the most forward in the rebellion were not the most backward in paying their court to the victorious monarch, who received them with great courtesy and kindness, and exhorted them to make use of the peace to restore their country to its former flourishing condition §.

▼ MARIANA.
Comment.
• ABARCA.

‡ ZURITA.      † HIERON. BLANCHE
‡ Las Memorias de FELIPE DE COMINES.

BUT he was quickly convinced that this treaty, which had The been negotiated with so much seeming candour, required French, many improvements and explanations, in order to render it by an insidious treaty, gain what they could not gain by a fair war. a safe and solid peace. He sent therefore two persons of distinction to Paris, with full powers to adjust every thing, and to set the most difficult points in a full and clear light. These ministers found so many obstacles on the road, that it was a long time before they got to Paris, and when they came there, they found the king absent. They would have followed him, but those intrusted with the administration caused them to be arrested <sup>b</sup>. This method of acting answered two ends; it gave the French an opportunity of destroying all the harvest in the neighbourhood of Perpignan, in hopes of causing a scarcity there, when they entered it, as they did with a powerful army; and, on the other hand, it kept the old king of Arragon in the dark, so that he had no kind of certainty whether peace or war was to be expected <sup>c</sup>. He went, however, to Barcelona, where he held an assembly of the states, who granted him all he could desire, or rather all they were able <sup>d</sup>. He sent also for his son Don Ferdinand, and though his affairs were much embarrassed in Castile, yet, by the advice of Donna Isabella, he set out for Arragon, and travelled with great dispatch; but, on his arrival at Saragossa, he found things in much confusion, the whole country being rent with faction <sup>e</sup>. He obtained, however, what forces he could, and, having assembled the states, desired them to enable the viceroy and the chief justice to put the laws in execution, and to restore the public tranquillity, giving them to understand that where there was no law, there could be no liberty. In the mean time, the old king, having received a supply of provisions from Naples, had re-victualled Perpignan, and, with the assistance of the troops his son brought him, had a tolerable army in the field <sup>f</sup>. Don Ferdinand returned again in a little time to Saragossa, where there was one Ximenes Gordo, who had gained such an ascendancy in the city, that nothing could be done without him, whose relations and creatures were possessed of all the good employments, and who, notwithstanding, were guilty of the most outrageous acts of oppression. Don Ferdinand inquired why these mischiefs were not redressed, and was told that Gordo's exorbitant power was too strong for the laws: Upon this he sent for him to the palace, and conducted him into a

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA Annal.<sup>c</sup> HIERONYMI BLANCÆ Comment.<sup>d</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>e</sup> ZURITA Annal.<sup>f</sup> HIER. BLANC.

Comment.

1474.

*Distressed
State of Arragon
by plague,
war, and factions.*

private apartment, where there were some of his guards, a hangman, and a priest, in whose hands he left him; and, as soon as he was informed that he was dead, he ordered the body to be publicly exposed, and then went to the states, and told them that it was their business to do the rest: upon which they seized his creatures, convicted and executed them by due course of law. Having thus restored the public peace, he returned to Castile <sup>e</sup>. The French, having a superior power in Roussillon, made themselves masters of Elne, and ravaged the best part of the country without measure or mercy, the circumstances of Don Juan being such as put it out of his power to oppose them.

1475.

THE king Don Henry of Castile being dead, and that country in the utmost confusion, Lewis XI. took the opportunity of pouring in multitudes of troops upon Roussillon; so that at length his generals were in a condition to besiege Perpignan for the third time <sup>h</sup>. The old king Don Juan, tho' laden with cares and infirmities, neglected nothing that could be done for the relief of that place, and would certainly have relieved it, if he had either been possessed of money himself, or if his subjects had been wealthy enough to supply him. But, for want of this, the French prevailed. The inhabitants, after eating cats, dogs, and all kind of vermin, surrendered, upon tolerable terms, about the middle of March; and, having stipulated a liberty of quitting the place, most of them retired into Catalonia <sup>i</sup>. After this conquest, Lewis thought fit to propose a truce for six months, which Don Juan was forced to accept, that he might have some time to provide against the next campaign. As soon as the truce was ended, the French renewed their hostilities, and pushed their conquests to the very frontiers of Catalonia <sup>k</sup>. At the same time that they made war on Arragon, the French attacked the dominions of Castile likewise, and made two irruptions into Biscay, but with little effect. However, the last obliged Don Ferdinand to make a tour into that province, which gave him an opportunity of having an interview with his father, whose affairs were never in a worse situation than at this juncture <sup>l</sup>. Arragon was so torn by factions, and over-run by banditti, that all the states could do to restore quiet was to authorize holy confederacies, that is, voluntary associations of private men taking arms for the public service. In Valentia the like mischiefs prevailed, and the plague ravaged Barcelona, and a great part of Catalonia <sup>m</sup>. The French heightened

<sup>e</sup> ZURITA Annal.<sup>h</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>i</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>k</sup> ZURITA.<sup>l</sup> ABARCA.<sup>m</sup> MARIANA.

all these mischiefs by continuing the war, while the Catalans found it impossible to assemble an army, till necessity obliged them to lay their hands upon the treasure belonging to the city of Barcelona, with which the inhabitants were very little pleased; but as there was no remedy, they were obliged to submit, more especially as it was not done without the king's orders. 1476.

AMONGST the rest of those potent persons, who made no scruple of increasing the calamities, and adding to the confusion in which affairs then were, Don Jayme of Arragon was one of the most troublesome. Having assembled a band of lawless persons, by their assistance he took possession of the duchy of Villa-Hermosa, and fortified several places for their own security. Upon this the king dispatched his orders to the viceroy of Valentia to set up the royal standard, and to make a fair trial whether the people of that kingdom would not enable him to redress these disorders, and to bring this powerful criminal to justice. The viceroy, in obedience to the king's orders, assembled what forces he was able, besieged the fortress into which Don Jayme had retired, and, having made him prisoner, sent him to Barcelona, where the king caused him to be beheaded, but gave his whole estate to his grandson. In the month of August, the infanta Donna Joanna embarked on board the fleet sent from Sicily, and, having touched first at Genoa, went from thence to Naples, in order to espouse the king Don Ferdinand. In the last interview the king of Arragon had with his son Don Ferdinand, he had pressed him exceedingly to receive the archbishop of Toledo again into his favour; to which all the answer he received was, that he would labour to overcome the extreme resentment that the queen Donna Isabella had against him; and it was with great satisfaction Don Juan received the news that this was accomplished; but he was by no means pleased that his son and daughter were determined to conclude a peace with the king of France; in consequence of which he saw plainly that the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne would be lost. To protract, however, the evil hour as much as possible, he negotiated a truce for another year, in hopes by that time he might be in a better condition to carry on the war. His natural son Don Juan de Arragon, archbishop of Saragossa, being dead, he, in conjunction with his son Don Ferdinand, solicited the pope to give that archbishoprick to Don Alonso of Arragon, who was the natural son of the king Don Ferdinand; which the pope absolutely compels the pope to grant the administration of Saragossa

Don Juan
to a ba-
rard of six years old.

1477.

* HIERON. BLANC. Comment.

° ZURITA.

P FERR.

1478.

refused on account of his being a child, and named the cardinal of Montreal to that archbishoprick; but the two kings adhering obstinately to their resolution of not having any other archbishop, the pope was constrained to declare Don Alonso administrator of the archbishoprick, with which they were satisfied <sup>9</sup>; and which shews how little these lucrative benefices contribute to the welfare of the church, when he, who was esteemed the head of it, could be obliged to grant administration of such a see to a bastard of six years of age, and thereby create a precedent equally pernicious and scandalous.

Dies at Barcelona, by which Arragon and its dominions are united to the crown of Castile.

THE king Don Juan, having appointed an interview with his son at Daroca, was preparing for his journey thither, when he was surpris'd by death at Barcelona, January 19th, 1479, when he had lived fourscore and two years, and had reigned over Arragon twenty-one <sup>r</sup>. He had by his first queen Donna Blanca, the widow of Martin king of Sicily, and the heiress of Navarre, the unfortunate Don Carlos prince of Viana, the still more unfortunate Donna Blanca, who espoused Don Henry of Castile, and, after having spent her whole life in sorrow, died of poison in prison, and Donna Leonora countess of Foix, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Navarre. By Donna Juana Henriques he had his son Don Ferdinand, who succeeded him in the throne of Arragon, Donna Juana queen of Naples, Donna Maria, and Donna Leonora, who died young. His natural children were almost without number. By a lady of the illustrious family of Avellaneda he had Don Juan of Arragon archbishop of Saragossa; by Donna Leonora de Escobar he had Don Alonso of Arragon, duke of Villa Hermosa, and count of Ribagorça; by a lady of Navarre he had two sons, that died young, and a daughter, Donna Leonora, who espoused Don Lewis de Beaumont constable of that kingdom; and, at the very time of his decease, he had a mistress, who was a Catalan. He was naturally just as well as brave, very liberal, but was apt to confide too much in his wives, his mistresses, and his favourites, whence arose all his misfortunes. His body was first deposited in the cathedral of Barcelona, and then carried on the shoulders of the principal nobility of Catalonia to the monastery of Poblet, and there interred with his ancestors <sup>s</sup>. His son Don Ferdinand confirmed the laws and privileges of the kingdom of Arragon at Saragossa on the 26th of June, did the same at Barcelona on the first of September, and from thence went to

<sup>9</sup> ZURITA Annal.<sup>r</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>s</sup> MARIANA.Valentia

Valentia for the like purpose<sup>t</sup>; and thus the crown of Arragon was united to that of Castile.

S E C T. XIII.

The History of the Spanish Monarchy, from the Accession of their Catholic Majesties Ferdinand and Isabella, to that of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and the first of that Name in Spain.

THE news of Don Henry's death no sooner reached the ears of the archbishop of Toledo, than he dispatched a courier with a letter to Don Ferdinand, then in the kingdom of Arragon, in which he gave him the title of king of Castile and Leon, and pressed him to lose no time in returning to his dominions<sup>a</sup>. His consort Donna Isabella did the like, but she thought it very expedient not to defer the ceremony of taking possession of the crown till his arrival. It was therefore with this view that, on the thirteenth of December, she caused herself to be publicly invested with all the ensigns of regal dignity, on a scaffold erected in the town of Segovia, upon which a throne was placed very richly adorned; and, when the queen was seated, a herald proclaimed Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella king and queen of Castile and Leon; after which, she went to the cathedral, where Te Deum was sung with loud acclamations of the people, and many of the principal nobility came to compliment her upon her accession, and to assure her of their fidelity, amongst whom none was more active than the cardinal of Spain and the archbishop of Toledo<sup>b</sup>. She dined that day with Andrew de Cabrera, alcaide of the citadel of Segovia, who delivered up to her that important fortress, with all the treasures that were in it. After dinner, she gave him the gold cup in which she drank; assuring him, that herself and her successors should annually, upon that day, send to him, or his representative, the gold cup in which they drank<sup>c</sup>. On the other hand, the marquis of Villena took all imaginable precautions for the security of the infanta; and, having renewed his intrigues with the king of Portugal, is supposed to have sent him the original will of king Henry, that he might be better satisfied as to the rights of this princess, be the more inclined to marry her, and to support the faction which the marquis was forming in her favour<sup>d</sup>, and to which his own numerous family and some other persons of quality, adhered.

1474:

<sup>t</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. ABARCA, HIERONYMI BLANCÆ, MARIANA, MAYÈRE TURQUET, FERRERAS. <sup>a</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, ZURITA. <sup>b</sup> LUCIUS MARINÆUS SICULUS.

<sup>c</sup> GARIBAY, Historia de España.

Find themselves obliged to defend their title by arms against the infanta Donna Juana.

UPON the arrival of the king Don Ferdinand at Segovia, he made a public entry with great magnificence, and, in conjunction with the queen, continued all the great officers of the crown in their respective charges<sup>e</sup>. It was not long, however, before some differences arose about the administration of the government. Many of the nobility thought it belonged intirely to the queen, as the sole heiress of Castile and Leon. Some, however, were of a contrary opinion, and had the lawyers on their side. At length it was agreed, that this delicate affair should be referred to the cardinal of Spain, Mendoza, and the archbishop of Toledo; and by them it was decided, that they should govern jointly; that the king's name should precede the queen's, but that he should do nothing of importance but by her consent, with which he was not intirely satisfied<sup>f</sup> (A). The archbishop of To-

<sup>d</sup> DAMIAN DE GOES, EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, ZURITA, FERRERAS.

<sup>e</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, & al.

<sup>f</sup> GARIBAY, &c.

(A) The articles settled between the arbitrators are reduced to five by Mariana, and are in substance these (1): 1. That in all letters, public acts, and inscriptions upon money, the name of the king should precede that of the queen; but with regard to the arms and titles of their respective dominions, those of the queen should have the preference. 2. That the governors of provinces, cities, and fortresses, should be appointed solely by the queen, hold the places in her name, and that all officers in the revenue should be accountable only to her. 3. That the provision of bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical benefices, should be in both their majesties names, but the nomination solely in the queen. 4. That when they happened to be separate, each should administer justice in the places where they happened to be. 5. And, with respect to ordinary magistrates, either of their majesties might appoint them, who had the privy council attending upon his or her person. It is very certain that Don Ferdinand was so little pleased, that he had some thoughts of returning into his own dominions; and it is also certain, that it was not the statesmen, but the queen Donna Isabella, who satisfied and made him easy (2).

(1) Historia general de España, lib. xxiv. Hernando del Pulgar. Zurita.

(2) Alonso de Palencia, ledo was so much displeased at the regard shewn by their majesties to cardinal Mendoza, that, after visible signs of discontent, he quitted the court intirely, under pretence of being desirous of spending the rest of his days in quiet, but in reality, as himself more truly expressed it upon another occasion, that he might contrive ways and means to make them sensible how dangerous it was to disoblige an archbishop of Toledo <sup>g</sup>. The king Don Juan of Arragon sent two persons of distinction to soften him; the king Don Ferdinand sent several of the first nobility on the same errand; the queen went herself to make him a visit at Alcala, but to no purpose, for he sent her word, if she entered the town at one gate, he would go out at the other <sup>h</sup>. They tampered also with the marquis of Villena, who made no scruple of setting his price, but, like many great politicians, set it too high <sup>i</sup>. At length Don Alonso the fourth, of Portugal, in the month of May, entered Castile, espoused his niece the infanta publicly, and took the titles to which he pretended by this marriage; so that the rest of the year was spent in all the confusion of a civil war, in which though the malecontents did not make any great progress, and even the principal places in the marquisate of Villena revolted in their favour; yet they found themselves so much distressed for money, that they were obliged to borrow, and convert into specie the church plate, which, for many reasons, was never done without great reluctance <sup>k</sup>.

1475.

THIS war was carried on, on both sides, at least as much by policy as by force of arms, which gave Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella great advantages. The former inquired strictly, and punished with great severity, all offences against the state; but shewed great mildness and lenity in affairs that regarded the crown, received almost all into favour who desired it, and granted them pardons for what was passed, but admonished them to do their duty and obey the laws for the time to come <sup>l</sup>. The queen was still more active, milder, and more munificent, the fame of which had great effects. The citadel of Burgos, which had held out an obstinate siege, was surrendered to the queen in person; and this became so much the mode, that with a flying army of no considerable force she reduced several places of strength. The king Don Ferdinand had recovered the town, and was be-

The Portuguese defeated before Toro by the king Don Ferdinand.

<sup>g</sup> ZURITA, LUCIUS MARINÆUS SICULUS, FER. <sup>h</sup> HER-
NANDO DEL PULGAR. ANTON. NEBRISS. <sup>i</sup> GARIBAY, &

<sup>al.</sup> <sup>k</sup> EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, DAMIAN DE
GONZ. <sup>l</sup> MARIANA, & al.

sieging the citadel of Zamora. He made an attempt upon Toro, which was the king of Portugal's head quarters, but without success. He managed this siege with greater address, investing the citadel so closely, that no succours could enter; and fortifying his camp so well, that it was very difficult to force. Don Alonso, notwithstanding, resolved to attempt the relief of the place, towards which the infant Don Juan brought him a great reinforcement of troops out of Portugal, for the raising of which he had made free with all the churches' treasure. The army of Don Alonso, thus reinforced, arrived before Zamora<sup>a</sup>. Don Ferdinand, tho' superior in number, remained close within his lines, and contented himself with disappointing all the attempts that were made to throw succours into the fortress, or to attack any of the posts. On Friday the first of March the enemy retired, but in good order, the king in the centre, the prince Don Juan on the right, the archbishop of Toledo, and his malecontents, on the left wing. Don Ferdinand passed the river with his army in pursuit of them; and about four in the afternoon, marching down the side of a mountain, he saw the enemy drawn up in order of battle, in a plain at a small distance from Toro, upon which an engagement ensued. Authors differ much in their accounts of this battle; but it is however agreed, that the centre and the left wing of the Portuguese were routed, the prince of Portugal retired towards night to an eminence, and made a good retreat from thence the next day. The loss was far from being great, and yet the victory proved decisive<sup>o</sup>. Don Alonso first sent the prince to cover his own country, and then followed with the rest of the army. The citadel of Zamora surrendered, and Don Ferdinand was left at liberty to go into Biscay, where the French were for the third time obliged to raise the siege of Fontarabia<sup>p</sup>. The archbishop of Toledo and the marquis of Villena detached themselves from the Portuguese, in order to mind their own affairs. The queen Donna Isabella drew over many of the malecontents, and most of the cities and fortresses that had been garrisoned by them revolted, and submitted to their majesties<sup>q</sup>.

Insolence of Don Alonso de Carillo, THE king of Portugal being gone into France to solicit succours from Lewis the eleventh, Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella had the more time to restore the domestic quiet of their dominions; a thing so much the more necessary, as in

<sup>a</sup> ALONSO DE PALENCIA, GARIBAY. FERRERAS.
<sup>p</sup> DAMIAN DE GONS, HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, MARIANA.
<sup>q</sup> RIBAY, ANT. NEBRISS.

<sup>o</sup> ZURITA, & al.

almost all the cities and great towns there were factions that archbishop kept up a kind of civil war amongst themselves, without of Toledo, paying any respect to the laws, or regard to the royal autho- and firm- rity. At Toledo these heats were carried so high, that, in ness of the their majesties absence, a battle was fought between the king and contending parties, in which a considerable number was slain queen. on both sides. At their return they caused a great number of the most factious persons to be arrested, and brought to a trial, where some were condemned to death, others to banishment and lighter punishments, according to the nature of their crimes; nor would their majesties hear of commuting those punishments for the sake of money, which had a very good effect<sup>r</sup>. There was still a kind of treaty going on with the archbishop; to facilitate which, their majesties went to Madrid, and the king offered to treat in person with that prelate at the Pardo; but the latter brought such a multitude of armed men in his retinue, that the king, who was very slenderly attended, thought fit to retire without seeing him<sup>r</sup>. Under colour of this treaty the archbishop sent for the constable, the duke of Infantado, the count de Haro, and other friends and relations, to the castle of Uceda, where he prevailed upon them to sign a letter to their majesties, drawn up with great skill and art, full of promises of fidelity and submission, but insinuating that sovereigns ought to have a great regard for their nobility; and proposing, at the close, that the method which had been practised in the reign of king Henry, when the king did nothing but by consent of four of his grandees, who by turns attended on his person, should be revived. Their majesties returned a very quick answer to this letter, in which they told the archbishop and his friends, that they would ever respect the laws to the maintenance of which they had sworn, and make a strict observance of those laws the recommendation to their favour; but this being the rule of their conduct, they knew not any rank of their subjects that had a right to exemption; and that, deriving their authority from divine and human laws, they would govern as sovereigns, and not as slaves to grandees, by whom they expected to be obeyed<sup>r</sup>. This answer mortified the archbishop extremely, more especially when he understood that the constable, and some other lords, were gone to Madrid, to make their submission to the king and queen; and that all the rest, being summoned, had taken the same step<sup>u</sup>. An ambassador from Edward the fourth of England had an audience of their majesties, and was received with great respect. The marquis of Villena had made his peace the year before, and promised to restore all the places he held to the crown: one of the chief of these was Truxillo; the queen went thither and summoned it; the governor refused to open the gates; the queen sent the marquis word, that if it was not surrendered by a certain day, he was to consider the agreement as void; upon which he came in person, and put it into her hands<sup>w</sup>, upon the twenty-fourth of June. In like manner the king and queen traversed most of the provinces, and settled things in the best manner possible, by a proper mixture of clemency and justice; and, by their orders, a truce for three years was concluded with the king of Granada, who, taking advantage of the troubles in their dominions, had made an irruption into the kingdom of Murcia, which, being in direct breach of a treaty, though for the present passed by, was not either forgiven or forgot<sup>x</sup>, more especially as it was accompanied with extraordinary provocations.

<sup>r</sup> EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, GARIBAY, ZURITA, FERRERAS.      <sup>r</sup> LUC. MARIN. SIG. ANTON. NEBRISS.      <sup>r</sup> MARIANA, & al.

That prelate, after various struggles, obliged to submit to their majesties.

THE queen spent the best part of the next year in the southern provinces of Spain, and was brought to bed of a son at Seville<sup>y</sup>, where the factions and disputes which had reigned for many years were intirely pacified, and the duke of Medina Sidonia, and the marquis of Cadiz, whose animosities were the principal source of this disorder, were commanded to quit the city, but allowed to live where-ever else they pleased. At the time their majesties quitted Toledo, they appointed Gomez Manrique corregidor or chief magistrate of that city, with instructions to look very closely to the behaviour of the inhabitants, and to prevent the reviving of those feuds which had already cost them so dear. The corregidor, who executed his office with great punctuality, suddenly called the principal inhabitants together, and, having put them in mind of the peace and happiness they had enjoyed under his government, and of the miseries to which they had been exposed for many years before, acquainted them with a design that had been formed to murder him in his bed, by the instigation of the archbishop; at which the whole assembly expressed the utmost abhorrence, caused such as were concerned in this black affair to be seized, and, upon conviction, executed, banished, or whipp

<sup>u</sup> HERN. DEL PULGAR, GARIBAY, FERRERAS.
<sup>y</sup> ZURITA, MARIANA.

<sup>w</sup> BERNALDEZ CARVAJAL. <sup>x</sup> LUC. MARIN. SICUL. & al

ped, without the least trouble or disturbance<sup>a</sup>. This disappointment in his design so provoked that proud prelate, that he suffered his troops to ravage all the country about Madrid, and solicited the king of Portugal to renew the war, promising to put all the places that he held into his hands<sup>a</sup>. The king and queen, being informed of this, took a short resolution of keeping no farther measures with him, and thereupon sent orders to Don Alonso of Arragon, the king's brother, to block up Alcala; immediately forbade his vassals by proclamation to pay him any rent, or to have any correspondence with him; and demanded of the pope, that an administrator might be named to receive the revenues of the archbishoprick, till, in virtue of a process in form, the see should be declared void. This had such an effect upon the turbulent archbishop, that he very speedily submitted, and, to obtain their majesties pardon, and the restitution of his temporalities, surrendered all the places he held in his hands<sup>b</sup>. This year the peace was concluded with Lewis the eleventh of France<sup>c</sup>, notwithstanding all the representations made by Don Juan of Arragon against it, who looked on himself as abandoned by it. 1478.

THE death of the king Don Juan of Arragon having obliged Don Ferdinand to make a tour into his hereditary dominions, the weight of the administration for that time was intirely supported by the queen Donna Isabella, who proceeded very roundly with such as still resisted, for there were very few now who disputed her authority. The war with Portugal still continued, and a great irruption was made in the spring into Galicia, where the enemy had some success at first, but were beaten in the end, and obliged to retire with loss; but they had better fortune in attacking a Castilian fleet which had been sent to the coast of Guiney, and returned from thence with an immense quantity of gold, of which not so much as a ship, or even a man, escaped. The bishop of Evora, who with a great body of troops, partly Portuguese, and partly Castilian rebels, made an irruption into Estremadura, in order to disengage some of the fortresses in that country, which were still in the hands of the malecontents, and which the queen had caused to be besieged, were engaged by the grand master of St. James, and beaten. The loss was not considerable on either side, but

<sup>a</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, ANT. NEBRISS. ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

<sup>b</sup> BERNALDEZ CARVAJAL, ALONSO

DE PALENCIA.

<sup>c</sup> GARIBAY, & al.

<sup>d</sup> Memorias

de FELIPE DE COMENES.

the greatest part of the Castilian malecontents were taken, which made it of consequence, and enabled the infantá Donna Beatrix, the widow of Don Ferdinand, brother to the king of Portugal, and aunt to the queen of Castile, to prevail upon Don Alonso to allow her to treat with the queen Donna Isabella of a peace between the two crowns*. The queen of Castile received this intelligence with great satisfaction; and, as soon as she could dispose things properly, had an interview with the infantá at Alcantara, where the principal articles of the peace were very soon adjusted; and though, upon the return of the infant, the king of Portugal, testified some dislike to them, yet by the persuasions of the infantá, and of his son the prince of Portugal, he was brought at last to approve them, and they were accordingly 1479. signed on the twenty-fourth of September (B); so that now their

* ALONSO DE PALENCIA, EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, BERNALDEZ, HERN. DEL PULGAR, FERRERAS.

(B) This is commonly called the peace of Alcacovas, from the place where it was concluded. It is generally believed that Don Alonso made this peace against his will, being forced to it by the remonstrances of his son the infant Don Juan on one side, and wearied into it by the solicitations of the infantá Donna Beatrix, duchess of Viseo, on the other. The terms are somewhat differently reported, but in the main appear to have been these: 1. The king of Portugal was to quit the title and arms of Castile, and their majesties were likewise to quit all pretensions upon Portugal. 2. He undertook not to marry the infantá Donna Juanna, or to give her any assistance. 3. The princess Donna Joanna was to make her choice, whether she would marry the infant Don Juan, then but a year old, or retire into a convent, and this in the space of six months. 4. The infant Don Alonso, son to the infant Don Juan, and grandson to the king of Portugal, was to marry, when of fit age, the infantá Donna Isabella of Castile. 5. The navigation of Guiney was reserved to the crown of Portugal, and that of the Canary Islands to Castile. 6. All who had followed the party of Portugal during the war were to be restored to their honours and estates, and their majesties were to grant a general pardon, without any exceptions. 7. The Portuguese were to restore what they possessed in Estremadura, and to evacuate that province. 8. For the security of the peace, the infantá Donna Isabella was to be given in hostage to Portugal, and the infant Don Alonso to Castile. 9. Lastly, All prisoners were to be released on both sides (8). The principal apparent cause their majesties were acknowledged by all their neighbours, and were left at full liberty to redress all the grievances, and remove all the inconveniences, that, during so many years of confusion, had crept into the government<sup>f</sup>.

(8) Hernando del Pulgar, Mariana, Ferreras.

THIS was the first care both of the king and queen, who Wise men for that purpose called a general assembly of the states at Atboda pur- Leon, in the month of January, where several old laws were sued for repealed, others explained, and many new ones made. Besides this, the whole frame of administering justice was re-settling the interior viewed, amended, and extended, in such a manner, that affairs of their domi- persons of all ranks were brought within the reach of the nions. law, and every town and village throughout their dominions had its proper magistrates assigned<sup>g</sup>. The next thing that fell under their consideration was the repeal of the grants made by Henry the fourth, of crown lands and of pensions out of the royal revenues, upon which the deputies from the cities very strongly insisted; but the king and queen thought it was a matter required much deliberation, and that some distinctions likewise ought to be made. The nobility were likewise of this opinion; and all possessed of these grants were obliged to exhibit them to their majesties confessor, who was vested with the power of allowing, annulling, or abridging them, as he thought proper; which he exercised in such a manner, that thirty millions of maravedies annually were brought into the exchequer. The queen Donna Isabella ordered the first year's revenue to be of this treaty, on the part of Portugal, was the great concern the infant Don Juan was under to see the blood and treasure of his country exhausted in favour of a title liable to so many objections; but the real and secret cause was said to have been his desire to see his son Don Alonso married to the infanta Isabella, which he flattered himself would one day raise him to the throne of Castile (9). Whatever his views were of this kind, such a notion prevailed universally in Portugal, and the king Don Alonso himself was so affected with the usage, that the infanta Donna Joanna met with, that he had determined to resign the crown, and retire into a convent, if he had not been prevented by death (1), at the very time when he was on the point of putting this design in execution.

<sup>f</sup> ALONSO DE-PALENCIA, CARVAJAL, GARIBAY, ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS.      <sup>g</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, MAYERNE TURQUET.

(9) Nunes, Faria y Sousa, le Clede, &c. Mariana, Mayerne Turquet, Ferreras, &c. al.

(1) Hernando del Pulg.

distributed amongst the widows and children of such as had suffered in any degree for their service<sup>b</sup>. Amongst the criminals that suffered in consequence of the new regulations, was Ferdinand Alarcon, whom the marquis of Villena had placed about the archbishop of Toledo, and who had been the principal author of the archbishop's ill conduct<sup>i</sup>. Yet sure it was some impeachment of their majesties justice, that, while this fellow was sent to the gallows, the archbishop and the marquis were both restored to their majesties favour. But the queen shewed a laudable firmness in the case of a gentleman of Galicia, who was condemned to die for the murder of a public notary, who was the only person that could have proved upon him the forgery of a bond for a large sum. To save this man's life, an offer was made of forty thousand pistoles in gold, which, though at that time an object of attention even to a crowned head, was refused<sup>k</sup>. Ambassadors were dispatched to Portugal, in order to adjust some disputes that were arisen about the terms of the peace, and to be present when the unfortunate infanta of Castile took the veil<sup>l</sup>; notwithstanding which, however, things were not intirely adjusted till the next year. The Turks having taken Tarentum, and threatening the island of Sicily, the king Don Ferdinand was obliged to make a considerable naval armament for the defence of his hereditary dominions. About this time also the formidable tribunal of the inquisition was first introduced into Spain<sup>m</sup> (C).

1480.

ALL

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA, ANTON. NEBRISS. HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, FERRERAS. <sup>i</sup> LUC. MARIN. SICUL. <sup>k</sup> BERNALD. CARVAJAL, EMAN. DE FARIA Y SOUSA <sup>l</sup> MARIANA. <sup>m</sup> GARIB. MAYERNE TURQUET.

(C) The Spanish historians are not perfectly agreed as to the time and manner in which the formidable tribunal of the inquisition came to be introduced in Spain. Mariana fixes it to the year 1478, and ascribes the origin of it to the cardinal of Spain (6). Other writers, whom we have reason to believe more correct, assure us it was not introduced till 1480, and give a very different account of the share that cardinal Mendoza had in this matter; for though they agree, that he acquainted their majesties with the great danger they were in from the numerous apostasies both to Judaism and Mohammedism, more especially at Seville, and from that freedom of conversation there was between persons of all religions, by which Christianity suffered much, chiefly from a kind of indolence and indifference which

(6) Historia general de Espana, lib. xxiv.

gradually

ALL things were adjusted with the crown of Portugal Noble in the beginning of the year, which gave their majesties an firmness in opportunity of putting the new plan for the distribution of the restor- justice in execution; and they chose to begin with Galicia, ing justice, which, of all the provinces in Spain, was in the worst after such condition. In order to this, Don Hernando de Acensa was an inter- named governor, and Don Garcia Lopez de Chintilla chief ruption. justice. On their arrival at the city of St. James, the officers of the crown dissuaded them from opening their com-gradually corrupted men's sentiments; and brought them at length to have little or no sense of any religion at all; their majesties desired that he would think of some method for correcting this evil; and accordingly, with some other ecclesiastics, he did take some steps for this purpose (7). But his method was judged to be too slow and mild; and therefore their majesties, by the advice of other persons, ordered their ambassador at the court of Rome to demand of pope Sixtus the fourth a bull for the establishment of the inquisition. At first there were only three inquisitors named, and they had their residence in the convent of the friers preachers at Seville; but the number of persons they arrested quickly made it necessary to provide them another kind of establishment, in consequence of which they were removed to the fortrefs of Triana, where, in their first Auto de Fe, which was the next year, they actually burnt seven apostates, and punished in a less severe degree several others (8). Mariana carries things much farther; he makes cardinal Turquemada the first inquisitor, and talks of putting to death two thousand, for the offences of which they were convicted before him, which there is good reason to look upon as an exaggeration. But it is however very certain, that the secrecy and severity with which they proceeded affrighted the Jews at Seville to such a degree, that great numbers of them retired into Portugal, and many into Barbary. He is right in saying Turquemada was the first inquisitor general; but he was not appointed so till the year 1483, upon the extension of the powers of this tribunal into many of the great cities of their majesties dominions; and very possibly it is to this time that terrible execution, of which Mariana speaks, is to be referred (9). Himself, and other modern writers, speak with great respect and deference of that tribunal; but it is out of all doubt, that, at the time it was first introduced, the Spaniards considered it, as all other nations where it is not established now do, as the most horrid invention that ever disgraced Christianity, and capable of producing as great mischiefs as those it was established to prevent.

(7) Zuniga, Annales de Sevilla, Paramo, Bernaldez.

Annales de Sevilla.

(8) Zuniga,

Annales de Sevilla.

(9) Bernaldez, Hernand. del Pulgar, Zuniga, &c.

missions, assuring them, that the whole country was full of little fortresses, the lords of which acted despotically, each in his little district; and that, if these united their forces, the army of the crown would not be in a condition to make any resistance. Don Hernando and Don Garcia answered, that the crown might be weak, but that God was omnipotent. They ordered open proclamation to be made, that they were there ready to do justice to all who demanded it, and against any who had done wrong; and they proceeded in this so briskly, and with so little respect to persons, that fifteen hundred gentlemen, who were conscious of having deserved death, quitted their country and estates to avoid it; upon which the governor and chief justice quickly changed the face of affairs; for the people in general, perceiving what benefits accrued to them from this commission, cheerfully contributed their assistance; so that when two persons of great distinction were arrested, brought to a trial, and convicted of several atrocious crimes, they were executed without any commotion, and notwithstanding they offered prodigious sums to save their lives<sup>a</sup>. The success that attended their endeavours in Galicia induced their majesties to take the same care of other provinces; so that, in much less time than could have been imagined, the peace of the kingdom was restored, and the people in many places cheerfully returned to their labours, who, from the injuries and ill usage they met with, had retired into Portugal, or taken shelter even amongst the Moors<sup>b</sup>. In the midst of the summer their majesties made a tour to Saragossa, Barcelona, and Valentia, where they procured the infant Don Juan to be received and acknowledged as their legal successor; and in this tour they regulated many things, and composed numberless feuds that had disturbed the public tranquillity for many years<sup>c</sup>. At Barcelona, particularly, the states represented to him, that the country was very much distressed by a misfortune, for which their prudence could suggest no remedy. The deceased king Don Juan had made very large grants to several persons, some of them of great quality, upon a surmise that those who formerly held those lands had been guilty of treason; which those who were thus dispossessed maintained to be absolutely false, and upon this presumption disturbed the possession of such as had the king's grants, and kept the country thereby in a continual state of war. Don Ferdinand, having inquired into this matter, found that his father was in the wrong, and declared his willingness to restore the old families to their lands, if it was practicable. The inhabitants of the city made it so, for, by a large free gift, they enabled the king to satisfy both parties, by restoring estates, or giving such equivalents, as to the parties were most acceptable. This year, by a secret impulse, says an eminent Spanish historian (a very strange phrase for a flagrant breach of faith!) the marquis of Cadiz gave beginning to the war of Granada, by making an irruption into the territories of the Moors, and carrying off a great booty, in a time of full peace (E); which induced 1481.

<sup>a</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, GARIBAY, FERRER. • LUC. MARIN. SIG. MARIANA.    <sup>b</sup> ZURITA, & al.

1 GARCIA, ZURITA, MARIANA, FERRERAS. 2 HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.

(D) There was nothing the queen Donna Isabella had so much at heart as the expulsion of the Moors out of Spain, from the mixed principles of ambition and zeal for religion; but there was besides a personal and particular resentment towards the Moorish monarch who then governed Granada, whom the Spanish writers stile Abobacen, or Abenbaxan, but whom the Moorish writers stile Abul Hossin (1). In his youth he had been an able officer and a very gallant man, and during the civil wars in Castile had made some irruptions with success. At the time he last renewed his truce with their majesties in the year 1478, the marshal Ferdinand Sabavedra, being in disgrace with Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, had retired for his own security to Ronda, in the king of Granada's dominions, who thereupon invited him to his capital, and in his presence reviewed seven thousand horse (2). Whether this was the effects of vanity, or whether he was desirous of learning any thing from the marshal, is not very clear; but it is certain this interview was fatal to them both. The Moorish monarch entertained so unjust an opinion of the power of their majesties, that, upon their demanding the usual tribute paid to their predecessors at the time of his renewing the truce, which was probably a matter of form, and intended only to keep alive their pretensions, he sent them word, that, in the same place where they coined money at Granada, they forged arms likewise, to prevent its being taken from them. That inability which hindered their expressing their resentment at that time, made it pierce the deeper. As for the marshal Sabavedra, he no sooner returned into Spain, than they demanded the strong fortrefs of Tarifa which was in his hands, and which his relations advised him to deliver up, which was the fruit of his journey to

(1) Ansa. Nebriss. Alonso de Palencia, Zurita. Pulgar.

(2) Hernando del

induced the Moors, on the other hand, to surprise the town of Zahara, on the twenty-seventh of December, where, after putting the inhabitants in chains, they left a strong garrison.

The beginning of the war of Granada, and the incidents that rendered it general.

THERE happened a dispute between their majesties and the pope, in regard to the bishoprick of Cuenca, which was of great advantage to the monarchy of Spain. The pope had a favourite nephew, upon whom he bestowed this bishoprick, though their majesties had recommended another person; a practice contrary to the laws of Spain, but which, in times of confusion, the popes had ventured upon with tolerable success. In the present case, the king ordered all his subjects to quit Rome, refused to admit a legate from the pope, and carried things so very high, that Sixtus the fourth was not only obliged to abandon his nephew, and to bestow the bishoprick as the king desired; but also to grant, to himself and his successors, by a bull, the right of nominating to all the archbishopricks and bishopricks in Spain, obliging himself and his successors to confirm them*. A common soldier, or, as some say, a subaltern officer, whose name was Juan de Ortega, undertook an exploit that immediately opened the war with the Moors; for, going as a spy into their territories, he perceived that Malaga and Alhama were without garrisons, and might be easily surprised. He reported this to the marquis of Cadiz, who made it his choice to attack Alhama, a very pleasant town, seated in the midst of the mountains, at the distance of somewhat more than twenty miles from Granada, on the banks of the Rio Frio; where, notwithstanding, are the finest warm baths in all Spain. This scheme was executed upon Thursday the * RAINALD, BALUZ, FERRERAS.

Granada (3). We have no distinct lights whether the truce was expired, or not, at the time the marquis of Cadiz made his incursion; in resentment of which, the king of Granada surprised Zahara, instead of complaining to their majesties, or desiring to renew the truce, by which he gave them an opportunity of executing the great design they had formed of subverting that monarchy, and driving the Moors out of Spain, which they afterwards accomplished, and of which he was the first victim, being deposed by his own subjects, as the author of their misfortunes; and dying in such poverty and distress, that his body had remained unburied, if it had not been for the charity of some Christian captives, who carried it to be interred upon an ass (4).

(3) Anton. Nebriſſ. Ferreras.

(4) Bernalden, Hernando del Pulger.

twenty-seventh of February, and the fortress surprised, all who were found therein being put to the sword. The Moors in the town, which was one of the richest as well as pleasantest in their possession, made a very brave and obstinate defence, but at length they were forced to submit, and the place was abandoned to the pillage of the Christian soldiers, who, not satisfied with an immense quantity of gold and jewels, actually proceeded to make slaves of above three thousand inhabitants<sup>t</sup>.

THIS, as it might well, alarmed Abul Hosssein, king of Zeal of the Granada, who immediately assembled a body of three thousand horse and forty thousand foot, with which he invested the place in the beginning of March, and at the same time his subjects infested the Christian territories on every side, so that the war immediately became general<sup>u</sup>. Don Ferdinand, who was just returned from Arragon, took a resolution of relieving this new conquest; and, having ordered his forces to assemble at Antequera with a superior army, Abul Hosssein, upon his approach, raised the siege<sup>w</sup>. Don Ferdinand, after this, retired into his own dominions, and went to meet the queen at Cordova, when the king of Granada, with a better army than before, invested the place a second time, and was very near taking it. When the news of this came to be canvassed in their majesties councils, the queen Donna Isabella cut the debate short, by declaring, that Alhama must be relieved: that she considered it as the first-fruits of their conquests, and that the time was come when the Mohammedans should be driven out of Spain. The king, agreeable to this oracle, marched with eight thousand horse and ten thousand foot, and raised the siege a second time in the month of May. The queen pursued her design with invincible firmness; she raised forces, she filled magazines, she equipped squadrons, that every thing might be in readiness when the operations of the war might require it. In the mean time the king, with the principal nobility, marched to besiege Loja, a beautiful and rich town at the bottom of the mountains, about eighteen miles from Granada. Don Alonso of Arragon, duke of Villa Hermosa, assured the king, and the rest of the nobility, that this enterprize was not so easy as they imagined, and that their forces were not numerous enough to invest the place; but this advice was slighted, till, by a series of losses in a few days, they queen Isabella in the maintenance of that war.

<sup>t</sup> GARIBAY, ZURITA, FERRERAS.
PULGAR, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.
RIN. SICUL.

<sup>u</sup> HERNANDO DEL
<sup>w</sup> LUC. MA-

1482.

were obliged to raise the siege, and that with circumstances of dishonour as well as loss. The queen affected a deep concern for this, though, as it agreed perfectly with her design, and kept the spirit of the war in full vigour, it may be her grief was not so great as it appeared <sup>1</sup>. The Moors, encouraged by this gleam of success, besieged Alhama the third time, under the command of prince Muly Abul Abdali, and were again very near taking the place, when Don Ferdinand, with a royal army, arrived on the fourteenth of August in its neighbourhood, and, the Moors being retired, changed the garrison, and supplied all the magazines <sup>2</sup>. This year was fatal to Don Alonso de Carillo, archbishop of Toledo, who had so much obliged and so much offended their majesties; to which see, in virtue of the bull before-mentioned, they appointed cardinal Mendoza. And this year likewise they discovered that Lewis the eleventh was endeavouring to marry his nephew the king of Navarre to the infanta of Castile their competitor, whom the new king of Portugal Don Juan had brought out of her convent, and had given her a palace to live in, where she was treated in a manner suitable to her birth <sup>3</sup>. But, notwithstanding this, nothing more was done in favour of that most unfortunate princess.

The young king of Granada, commonly called Mohammed Boabdil, but whose true name was Muly Abul Ab-dali, taken prisoner.

THE king Don Ferdinand, having sent a minister into Italy to solicit the princes and states of that country to live upon good terms with each other, and to unite all their forces against the Turk, it was attended with so good effects, that the general tranquillity was in a short time restored; upon which the pope sent to compliment their majesties, and, of his motion, granted them very large ecclesiastical supplies for their war against the Moors, that is, powers to levy money upon the clergy <sup>4</sup>. The campaign in the spring was by no means favourable to the Christians. They endeavoured to penetrate through a country full of woods and rocks, with which they were little acquainted, where they suffered prodigiously during their march; and being continually exposed to the insults of their enemies, they were at length compelled to retreat with great loss <sup>5</sup>. The young king of Granada, Muly Abul Abdali (for at this time there was a schism in that country, his father Abul Hossain reigning at Malaga, and himself in the proper capital), elevated with this success, and willing to signalize himself at the beginning of his reign by

<sup>1</sup> GARIBAY, MARIANA, FERRERAS.

DEL PULGAR, ZURITA.

GOES, ed. Nunez.

LUC, MARIN. SICUL. FERRERAS.

<sup>2</sup> HERNANDO

<sup>3</sup> BERNALDEZ, DAMIAN DE

<sup>4</sup> RAINALD, & al.

<sup>5</sup> GARIBAY,

some great action, took the field with a large body of troops, and advanced without any considerable resistance as far as Lucena, on the frontiers of Andalusia: having, in this excursion, acquired a prodigious booty, he began to take measures for his retreat; which he had scarce begun, before the count de Cabra, with a small corps of choice forces, passed Lucena in pursuit of them. It happened very fortunately that the day was misty, so that when they came up with the Moors, and charged them, their strength could not be discerned: some of the Moors crying out that the whole forces of Andalusia were falling upon them, a sudden panic seized them, and the route began almost as soon as the battle, those in the rear abandoning their booty, and shifting for themselves, without striking a stroke<sup>d</sup>. The young king did all he could to encourage his troops, both by his words and his example, but to little purpose, till at length, his horse being killed, he endeavoured to make his retreat on foot; but two soldiers following him, and attacking him with pikes, he was quickly overcome and taken. They were on the point of killing him for his rich arms, when some of the officers came up and rescued him out of their hands; and the nephew of the count Don Diego de Cordova, without knowing his quality, sent him prisoner to Lucena<sup>e</sup>. As soon as the king Don Ferdinand arrived at the city of Cordova, he sent to the count of Cabra to bring his royal prisoner thither, which he immediately obeyed; and the Moorish prince made an entry into that city very magnificent, and with all the circumstances of respect that he could desire; after which, the king sent him to the fortress of Porcuna, where he was likewise treated with all possible lenity. The king Don Ferdinand made an autumn campaign with a great army with little effect, except burning all the flat country about Granada, and taking and destroying the town of Taxara. Upon his return to Cordova, a treaty was set on foot for procuring the liberty of the captive monarch; upon which the council of Castile were much divided, some, for various reasons, which they alleged, were for rejecting all proposals of that sort. The marquis of Cadiz and the count de Cabra were of the contrary opinion. They said, if the king was detained, the Moors would restore his father, and act with unanimity and vigour; whereas, if he was released, there would be a divided title, and the division of the Moors was the advantage of the Christians. The king referred both opinions to Donna Isabella, who thereupon decided in favour of the latter. By the treaty with the king's mother, the Christian prisoners in Granada were to be released, the king was to become vassal to the crown of Castile, to pay an annual tribute of twelve thousand crowns, and to give hostages for the due performance of them. When the terms were settled, the king of Granada had an audience of Don Ferdinand; he bent his knee as he entered the room, and a second time about the middle of it, with which the king of Castile was displeased. He would have knelt to him when he came up, and have kissed his hand, which is the manner of doing homage; but Don Ferdinand prevented it, and told him, that he had treated with him as with a king, and that he was free from every thing but the engagements he had entered into in that character. He embraced, complimented him, and, after making him magnificent presents, sent him home. The war, however, continued with Abul Hossain, who soon after drove out his son, and obliged him to retire to Almeria. The marquis of Cadiz, by a well-conducted enterprize, recovered the town and fortress of Zabara, upon which the king created him duke of Cadiz and marquis of that place<sup>b</sup>, though the Spanish historians seldom stile him duke.

<sup>d</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, &c.<sup>e</sup> ZURITA, & al.
favour

A great alteration
in the manner of making war against the Moors.

THEIR majesties sent their ambassadors into France, to demand the restitution of the county of Roussillon; and that not being granted, they were to renew their alliance with Charles the eighth, who was just come to that crown. The new king assured them that matter should be settled by ambassadors he had sent into Spain, and would have persuaded them to renew the treaty; which they declined, and insisted strongly that the late monarch Lewis the eleventh, being convinced of their majesties right to the county in question, had actually dispatched orders for its restitution; which the regents had stopped upon his demise, and, as they refused to renew these orders, they desired leave to return home. Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella were then in Arragon, where they held an assembly of the three estates at Tarragona, and demanded supplies for the recovery of Roussillon, as well as for the war of Granada. The king Don Ferdinand remaining there longer than he expected, the queen set out for Toledo, and the campaign of the spring was made without any event of importance. But Donna Isabella took care to provide every thing necessary for continuing the operations against Granada with effect ; and laboured more especially to provide artillery, with such provisions and beasts of carriage as would enable the troops to keep the field till winter ; she took care also to have a good fleet at sea, to prevent any succours that might arrive from Barbary ; and from hence it plainly appeared, that she had in view an absolute conquest. These preparations demanded a very large expence ; but she managed things with such frugality, that there was a very considerable saving out of what had been granted for these services, which she caused to be refunded, that the people might be sensible, though she desired the crown might be supported, she was very far from intending that the people should be impoverished<sup>1</sup>. In June Don Ferdinand arrived at Cordova, attended by the cardinal of Spain, his brother Don Alonso the marquis of Villena, and the flower of the Spanish nobility ; and, having entered the enemies country, took Alora, Aloyzana, Sentenil, destroying all things up to the gates of Granada ; after which, the winter drawing on, he retired to Cordova<sup>k</sup>. The war was now carried on in a manner very different from what it was formerly. The operations of the campaign were settled by a general council of war, and the like councils were held frequently in the field ; so that every step was taken with some design, the ultimate view of their operations being to facilitate the siege of Granada. Abul-Hossein was sensible of this, and sent to desire peace almost upon any terms ; to which Don Ferdinand returned such answers, as shewed plainly enough that he would grant none<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> LUC. MARIN. SICUL. GARIBAY, ZURITA, FERRERAS, MARIANA. <sup>b</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, PETER MARTYR Angl. MAYERNE TURQUET.

1484.

THE queen Donna Isabella applied herself all the winter with her accustomed diligence to provide every thing that was necessary for continuing the war, and the fruits of her precaution quickly appeared. The monarch of Fez found himself so incommoded by the Spanish fleets that were cruising upon his coasts, as to judge it necessary to try whether, by an embassy, he might not procure some ease to his subjects : accordingly he sent ambassadors with rich presents, and their majesties readily consented to a peace, upon his obliging himself not to give any succours to the king of Granada. The first enterprizes in the spring were not attended with much success ; but the grand army, which assembled at Cordova, made a very different appearance from what it had done formerly. It consisted of twelve thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, but these were all choice

Still more alterations made, and the military system very highly improved.

<sup>1</sup> GARIBAY, LUC. MARIN. SICUL. FERRERAS.
<sup>2</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, MARIANA.

<sup>k</sup> HER-
<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, & al.

troops, and a numerous train of artillery, with tents, carriages, and all other necessaries requisite for a long campaign; and their majesties saw with great pleasure almost all the nobility of Spain ready to attend their monarch. The king's equipage was remarkably plain, and consisted but of a few persons: the king and queen took notice of this to some of the most sensible of the grandees, who immediately reduced their own. This had the desired effect, and, without the formality of the law, frugality became the fashion; and about the middle of April this army, the least pompous and the most formidable that had been seen in Spain, took the field. The true design was the siege of Malaga; but, before this could be made, the king found it necessary to reduce Coin, Cartama, Ronda, and a multitude of other places, which cost a great deal of time, treasure, and blood. The Moors saw their destruction was coming on, and defended themselves like brave men who were become desperate. Don Ferdinand, with his usual prudence, granted favourable capitulations, and executed them with great punctuality, in so much that multitudes of the Moors desired leave to settle in the heart of his dominions. He caused them to be sent thither at his own expence, and gave them houses, land, and money in their pockets. There were many more who desired to be transported to Barbary; which was also granted, and many ships were employed in this service. Some of their captains threw the poor wretches overboard, to get possession of their effects. Their majesties, informed of this, caused a strict inquiry to be made, executed the criminals, confiscated their estates, and transmitted the produce of them to the relations of those they had murdered in Barbary. At the close of the campaign the king took the castles of Gambil and Alhabar, besides many more that were demolished; and though it was found impracticable to besiege Malaga, yet the reduction of seventy good towns, and a vast extent of country, rendered this campaign very glorious<sup>a</sup>. The Moors, tired of their old king Abul Hossain, deposed him, and seated his brother Mohammed Al Zagel upon the throne, who had before forced his nephew Muly Abul Abdali to fly into Murcia, after murdering most of his family<sup>o</sup>. There was this year an insurrection at Saragossa against the inquisition, and, in the tumult, the principal inquisitor was murdered, who on that account was considered as a martyr and 1485.

<sup>a</sup> GARIBAY, HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS. <sup>o</sup> LUC. MARIN. SIG. ZURITA.

a saint,

a saint, and the people persuaded that miracles were wrought through his intercession.

THE war with Granada was now so famous throughout Europe, that several persons of high quality and of martial disposition repaired thither from foreign countries, to have a share in so memorable an enterprize; and amongst these was an English lord, to whom they give the title of earl of (E) Escalas, who brought with him one hundred esquires, and a number of private men in proportion<sup>1</sup>. The army assembled at Cordova in the month of April, and consisted of twelve thousand horse, forty thousand foot, six thousand pioneers, two thousand carriages and waggons for the service of the artillery, and fifty thousand horses and mules for the baggage, and other services. As soon as they took the field, they marched directly towards Loja, which was now become the seat of Abdul Abdali's sovereignty, who, out of zeal for his religion, had concluded an agreement with Mohammed Al Zagel, and renounced his alliance with their majesties of Castile. He behaved himself very bravely upon this occasion, gave the Christians great disturbance by perpetual sallies, till he was confined to his bed by his wounds, and at length capitulated upon very honourable terms, except that he became once more a vassal to Don Ferdinand<sup>2</sup>. The Christians proceeded next to besiege Yllora, and to block up Machin, places that were requisite towards forming the new frontier; by which the Moors were to be shut up within a very small district; and, when these places were reduced, fortified, and sufficient garrisons left in them, the army proceeded once more into the plain of Granada, in order to burn and destroy the harvest; which in a great measure they performed, notwithstanding they met with a vigorous opposition, and that the operations of the whole campaign cost a great deal of blood. We may add to this, that the expence of the war was by this time risen so high, that it must have terminated here, at least for some years, if the queen had not found resources in the reputation she had acquired by her prudent management of the finances, which enabled her to raise the necessary supplies for the next campaign by loans from her own subjects<sup>3</sup>. 1486.

As the war against the Moors became every campaign more and more serious, the nobility were very careful in recruiting their respective corps in the winter, that they might be

<sup>1</sup> GARIBAY, ZURITA, FERRERAS.

<sup>2</sup> LUC. MARIN.

SICUL. M. RIANA.

<sup>3</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.

<sup>4</sup> MA-

YERNE TURQUET, & al.

(E) Lord Scales.

by the Christians, the great diligence of their majesties in procuring and providing all things effectually, prevented their losing any time when they were once assembled. The heavy rains that had fallen prevented any excursions in the winter season ; but, by the five-and-twentieth of March, which was the time appointed, their majesties, who were at Cordova, assembled their army of twenty thousand horse and fifty thousand foot, with a corps of eight thousand pioneers, and other persons belonging to the artillery, and on the seventh of April they opened the campaign<sup>u</sup>. But, before we speak of the military operations of the Christian army, it will be proper to observe, that Abul Abdali, after the loss of Leja, had been obliged to retire to the frontiers of Murcia, where he lived under their majesties protection. At first he had a great number of adherents, who followed his fortune ; but, as his funds grew low, the number of his subjects lessened, till at length he saw himself in danger of being totally abandoned ; and this made him so desperate, that he resolved to hazard himself, and the few that he had left, in an attempt upon Granada, in which city he knew he had a strong party. As desperate as this scheme seemed to be, it was nevertheless successful ; he found entrance into the city, seized a part of it, and, being supported by a strong body of horse from Murcia, obliged his uncle to retire<sup>w</sup>. In this situation things were when the king Don Ferdinand invested Velez, or Velez Malaga, a well-built, pleasant, and strong town, seated in a plain surrounded by mountains, within little more than a mile of the Mediterranean. The Moors of Mohammed Al Zageh's party advised him by all means to attempt the relief of this place ; the reputation of which, if he was so happy as to achieve it, would not fail to restore to him the possession of Granada without a blow. He assembled, with this view, a good corps of horse, and about twenty thousand foot, with which he entered the adjacent mountains, and from thence continually harassed and disturbed the Christian army ; and once made a bold attempt to seize their artillery, but without effect ; so that at length the place capitulated, and the greatest part of the inhabitants submitted to their Catholic majesties. It was next resolved to besiege Malaga, one of the strongest and best peopled places still remaining to the Moors ; but an attempt was first made to corrupt Hamet Zegri, who commanded a large body of Barbary Moors, in the strong castle of Gibralfaro, which commanded the town; but Hamet answered, that he was hired to defend the place, and he would never betray it; and that he hoped this answer would procure him favourable treatment, in case he should be compelled to surrender, after the best defence he should be able to make<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR. GARIBAY, FERRERAS. <sup>w</sup> LUC. MARIN. SICUL. MARIANA.

THIS city was invested completely both by land and sea The siege on the seventh of May, not without very considerable loss and sur- on both sides. The Christians continued the siege with vi- render of gour for a long time, and the Moors defended themselves Malaga, with great spirit and patience. In the mean time Mohammed with the Al Zagel collected all the troops he could, in order to af- wonderful ford them succours; but he had scarce marched them out of confe- Guadix, before they were attacked by Muly Abul Abdali, by quences whom the best part of them were cut in pieces<sup>2</sup>. Upon this which at- tend it- he sent a present of several horses with rich furniture, with some pieces of cloth of gold and silk, to their Catholic majesties, advising them to be very careful in preventing any sort of provisions from being carried into the place, where famine would soon force them to yield; and assured them, that when they were masters, as some say, of Almeria, Baza, and Guadix, they might depend upon his putting Granada into their hands<sup>3</sup>. A desperate Moor, however, was very near snatching this conquest out of their hands. He came out of Malaga in the night, and, going to the first guard of the Christian army, demanded to be carried to the marquis of Cadiz. When he was brought to him, he pressed to see their majesties, to whom he said he would discover the means of entering the town. The marquis did not regard him much; but those who were about him carried him to the king's quarter, and brought him to the tent of Donna Beatrix de Bobadilla, who was playing at draughts with Don Alvaro of Portugal. The Moor, seeing Donna Beatrix very richly dressed, made no doubt but she was the queen, and that the person playing with her was the king; upon which, drawing his scymitar, he discharged a blow with all his force on Don Alvaro's head: Donna Beatrix fainting and falling down, another blow, that he aimed at her, reached no farther than her sleeve; and, before he had time to strike a third, he was dispatched by those who were in the place<sup>4</sup>. The king was asleep; but the queen, being in the next apartment, hearing the noise, came out, and was an eye-witness of this shocking scene. At length Malaga would have capitulated; but the king refused any other terms than surrendering at discretion, to which they were at last forced to submit, and the town was accordingly surrendered on the eighteenth of August<sup>d</sup>. By this means many thousands were made slaves, some of the nobility having a hundred, others fifty, for their share, besides those that were sent as presents to the kings of Portugal and Naples<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, GARIBAY, FERRERAS. <sup>2</sup> LUC.
MARIN. SICUL, MAYERNE TURQUET, MARIANA. <sup>3</sup> LUC.
MARIN. SIC. <sup>4</sup> ANTON. NEB. & al.

1487. About the close of September their majesties returned to Cor-dova, and went afterwards to spend their winter at Saragossa.

A new scheme of making war, by creating another frontier, by conquests of several places.

AFTER obtaining from the states of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, considerable supplies, their majesties went into the kingdom of Murcia, where the army was to assemble, and which was far from being so considerable as it had been two years before, but numerous enough for the intended operations of the campaign<sup>f</sup>. The king began by investing Vera, to the inhabitants of which he offered very fair terms: the terror they were under of being treated with the same severity that the inhabitants of Malaga had met with, induced them to submit, and their example was followed by many of the adjacent places. Mohammed Al Zagel, apprehending that Don Ferdinand meant to besiege Almeria, shut himself up in it with a thousand horse and two thousand foot; which saved that place indeed, but left the rest of the country open, so that Don Ferdinand reduced Huescar, Galera, Orie, Tijola, Cuellar, Benaumarel, and many other places of less consequence; into which having put proper garrisons, the army marched into the plains of Baza, where the scene was changed; the Moors, instead of submitting, making a most vigorous resistance; insomuch that the army suffered great loss, and, amongst other persons of distinction, Don Philip of Navarre, natural son to Don Carlos, prince of Viana, was killed upon the spot. The king Don Ferdinand, judging it proper to retire, after giving the necessary directions for the security of the frontiers, returned 1488. to Valladolid. After his departure, Mohammed Al Zagel recovered several places, and laboured all that was in his power to revive the spirits of his nation, and to prevail upon them to unite firmly in defence of their religion, their country, themselves, and their posterity, though to little effect.

<sup>d</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULG. FERRERAS.
GARIBAY.

<sup>e</sup> BERNALDEZ,
<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, LUC. MARIN. SICUL. MA-RIANA.

It was the great prudence of the queen to observe an exact proportion between the means she employed, and the ends which she proposed from them. This appeared very conspicuously in the difference between the army assembled in this and the preceding year; the former was full seventy, the latter did not exceed twenty thousand men. The king joined them as soon as they were formed, and directed his march towards Baza, which, though not the greatest, was by far the strongest and best situated place in the possession of Al Zagel. Mohammed Al Zagel<sup>k</sup>. That prince, being very sensible of this, threw into it two of the best officers he had, with three thousand horse and five thousand foot; besides, the fortifications were in perfect good order, and their magazines of all sorts well supplied. As the alcaide knew the importance of the place, and had an army rather than a garrison under his command, he defended the suburbs and the posts beyond them as long as it was possible, so that a great many men were lost before the place could be invested, or the siege formed. When these difficulties were overcome, the ground was found so uneven, and the lines of so great extent, that they could not avoid several unlucky impressions made by the vigorous sally of the besieged, notwithstanding that the king, by posting an ambuscade, cut off five hundred Moors at once. The summer advancing, and the heat being very intense, the men were much dispirited, and diseases prevailed in the camp; however, a large supply arriving from the queen revived them for the present, and her majesty having caused a track to be cut through the mountains, for the mules that were laden on one side, and another for those that returned empty on the opposite side, the convoys arrived regularly<sup>l</sup>. The grand sultan of Egypt having sent ambassadors to the pope, to threaten retaliation on the Christians settled in his dominions, if their majesties continued the war against Granada, the pope sent them to the king; upon which a great party in his council advised him to raise the siege. This he deferred till he had the queen's opinion; which being directly contrary to that advice, the ambassadors were dismissed with presents<sup>m</sup>. But, after all, it would have been certainly raised, from the obstinate resistance of the Moors, if the queen had not gone to the camp in person with a great reinforcement. This had a double effect; it raised the spirits of the army, which were sunk to a great

The siege and reduction of Baza, and the submission thereupon of Mohammed

<sup>k</sup> ZURITA. MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.
<sup>l</sup> LUC. MARIN. SICUL. ANTON. NEBRISS. <sup>m</sup> HER-
 NANDO DEL PULGAR, PET. MARTYR Angl.

degree; and it made such an impression on the besieged, that the alcaide offered to capitulate<sup>a</sup>. The king gave him as good terms for his garrison as he could desire, and still better for himself; so that he entered into his service, and undertook to negotiate with Mohammed Al Zagel the surrender of Guadix and Almeria without the fatigue of sieges, in which, to the great astonishment of Moors and Christians, he prevailed<sup>o</sup>. In this transaction the Moorish prince behaved with great prudence and magnanimity. He had consented to the surrender of Baza, upon a representation that it was impossible to defend it longer: he knew that Guadix and Almeria were not near so tenable; and he knew also that he had no succours or assistance to expect. He made, therefore, the best terms possible for his people, but he refused to make any for himself; all the favour he desired was, that he might have the honour of presenting the keys of Almeria to Don Ferdinand in person, which was very readily granted. The king, having appointed his uncle Don Henry Henriquez governor of Baza, marched from thence with part of the army over the mountains; while the queen, with the other part, took another route. When they drew near Almeria, Mohammed Al Zagel marched out to meet them at the head of a corps of cavalry. Some of the nobility in the Christian army advanced officiously to receive him, and persuaded him, when the king was in sight, to dismount, and to present the keys on foot; for which Don Ferdinand reprimanded them severely, called them a parcel of ill-bred clowns, desired the Moorish monarch to remount his horse, and, having placed him by his side, rode with him into the city, and treated him with all possible kindness and respect.

1489. He granted the inhabitants the same terms that had been given to those at Baza, kept his Christmas there with great solemnity, and, reviewing his army on the last day of the year, found that he had lost twenty thousand men in a campaign of seven months<sup>p</sup>. But of these the Spanish historians would have us believe the far greater part died of diseases.

Another campaign against Granada, in which In the beginning of the succeeding year, Mohammed Al Zagel put the king in possession of Guadix, and prevailed upon a multitude of other places to submit, particularly the country of Alpujarros, which otherwise from its situation it would have been very difficult, if not impracticable, to

<sup>a</sup> GARIBAY, FERRERAS, MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>o</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.

<sup>p</sup> LUC. MARIN. SIC. ANT.

NEBRISS

reduce. The king, in return, made him a present of the ~~the whole~~ best town and one of the finest districts in that country, ~~country~~ with a promise that if the two thousand peasants, who occu- ~~adjacent is~~ pied his villages, did not pay him four millions of marvadies ~~destroyed.~~ annually, the sum should be made up out of the royal treasury; and he farther added, that if at any time he desired to retire into Barbary, he should have free licence, with all his family, and have the full value of his estate given him in ready money <sup>9</sup>. The Alcayde of Baza, and other Moors, who had deserved well upon this occasion, were rewarded with like generosity <sup>1</sup>. The next great affair that came upon the carpet was summoning Muly Abul Abdali to surrender Granada, according to his promise. His answer was, that their majesties had put it out of his power; that the number of the inhabitants were swelled to three times what they were at the time of his making that promise, by their reducing all the places round about; and they would destroy him upon the least suspicion of such a design <sup>2</sup>. Their majesties then returned to Seville, where they consented to the marriage of Donna Isabella to the infant Don Juan of Portugal; and, as soon as their domestic affairs would permit, Don Ferdinand took the field with a considerable army, with which he ravaged the plain of Granada, where the Moors gave him great opposition; and behaved very gallantly <sup>3</sup>.

AMONGST those who distinguished themselves in this ex- Moham: pedition were Mohammed Al Zagel and the marquis de Villena; med Al the former by a stratagem surpris'd a very strong castle; the Zagel de latter, seeing his servant attacked by six Moorish cavaliers, ~~fires leave~~ advanced alone to his assistance, killed two of them, put ~~to retire~~ the other four to flight, and brought off his wounded ser- ~~into Bar-~~ vant, tho' he was himself disabled in the right arm <sup>4</sup>. The ~~bary, and~~ king was recalled from this campaign by the total revolt of ~~receives it.~~ the Alpujarros, and by commotions in almost all his new conquests; so that he was forced to turn the Moors out of Baza and Guadix, and, with great difficulty, pacified the people in the Alpujarros <sup>5</sup>. Towards the close of the year, Mohammed Al Zagel came to him, and, having kissed his majesty's hand, desired his permission to retire to Barbary with such as were content to follow his fortunes. The king complied with his request, gave him a ship with a passport, and tho' it was very inconvenient to him, since he borrowed the money, paid him the full value of his estate <sup>a</sup>. After his departure, he gave the government of Alpujarros to the marquis of Villena <sup>y</sup>. Before the expiration of the year, their majesties received two mortifications; one was the recovery of several places out of their hands by Muly Abul Abdali king of Granada; the other, that the republic of Genoa having offered to submit to them, the situation of their affairs would not allow them to receive that state under their protection <sup>z</sup>.

<sup>9</sup> ZURITA.<sup>1</sup> LVC. MARIN. Sicul.<sup>2</sup> FERR.<sup>3</sup> MAYERNE TUAQUET.<sup>4</sup> GARIBAY.<sup>5</sup> MARIANA.

1490.

At length
the capital of Granada is invested
and besieged by their majesties.

THE queen having taken the necessary care for an ample supply of every thing the ensuing campaign might demand, the king Don Ferdinand took the field before the end of the month of April with an army of upwards of 70,000 men; and finding, that, in spite of their late chastisement, the inhabitants of the Alpujarros had supplied the city of Granada with vast quantities of provisions, he transferred the war thither, and punished them indeed very severely, but not without great loss, the king of Granada sending into that mountainous country a numerous corps of troops <sup>a</sup>. He next sacked all the plain of Granada, and completely invested the place, in which there were not fewer at this time than one hundred thousand souls. The queen Donna Isabella repaired to the camp, with the rest of the royal family, and were very conveniently lodged in the tent of the marquis of Cadiz, which stood next to the king's <sup>b</sup>. One night the queen complaining to one of her maids, that the candle offended her eyes, and hindered her from sleeping, she removed it into a corner, and both of them falling asleep, the tent took fire, by which the lives of the whole royal family were endangered, and the camp thrown into the utmost confusion. The king, half-naked, mounted on horseback, and, having collected a great body of cavalry, posted them in the avenues leading from the city, and so covered the camp till the fire could be extinguished <sup>c</sup>. The queen reflecting upon this accident, and resolving to prevent the like for the future, formed a very extraordinary project. She caused, in a convenient place, two long and broad streets to be drawn in the form of a cross, and as there were great quarries in the neighbourhood, the pioneers quickly constructed low but very convenient houses of stone. As soon as the army comprehended the queen's design, they assisted in it so cheerfully, that there quickly appeared a regular and very confi-

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA.
<sup>y</sup> FERRERAS.
DEL PULGAR.

<sup>yy</sup> LOC. MARIN. Sicut.
<sup>b</sup> ANGON, NEBRISS.

<sup>z</sup> ZURITA.
<sup>c</sup> HERN.

derable

derable town, to which they would have given the name of Isabella; but the queen expressly commanded it should be called Santa Fé, that is, Holy Faith; and it has been since honoured with the name of a city <sup>d</sup>.

THE construction of this place, if it did not occasion, at least it accelerated, the reduction of Granada; for the court and the principal nobility being perfectly well lodged, provisions of all sorts were brought in great abundance to the new town, while famine raged in the city <sup>e</sup>. One must be void of humanity not to feel for these unhappy people, who perceiving plainly, by this disposition of things, that they had nothing to hope, abandoned themselves to all the frantic expressions of despair, sometimes crowding their mosques, and, with loud exclamations, imploring the assistance of their prophet; at others running in troops to the burial-places of their ancestors, weeping and lamenting over their tombs, and regretting that a fate worse than death was appointed for themselves. Sometimes flocking about the Alhambra, or palace, they loaded their king with execrations, and imputed to him a calamity of which none had so deep a sense as himself; at others rushing out upon the Christians with a fury that took from them the sense of danger, and the capacity of avoiding it. At last, like wild beasts in the toil, they sunk, through very weariness, into a kind of calm, of which their chiefs taking advantage, proposed, and obtained their consent, to make the best capitulation they could; which, after some time spent in negotiation, was at length signed by the plenipotentiaries on both sides, on the 25th of November <sup>f</sup> (F).
It

<sup>d</sup> Les Delices d'Espagne, p. 512.

<sup>e</sup> HERN. DEL PUÑO.

<sup>f</sup> ZURITA.

(F) The kingdom of Granada was already shrunk within the walls of that city, which had formerly occupied a large proportion of the south of Spain, and was for a time the most flourishing of all its numerous principalities, as having under its jurisdiction thirty-two cities and ninety-seven walled towns, exclusive of innumerable villages, the inhabitants of which paid an annual tribute of 700,000 crowns in gold. In its most flourishing state, the city itself contained upwards of 60,000 houses, and 400,000 inhabitants (1). In the low condition to which it was then fallen, it was still formidable; and therefore their majesties very prudently granted easy and moderate terms, that they might once gain possession of this last fortress of the Moors, knowing well that time and accident, the

(1) Martiana, Bermudez, Colmenares, Delices de l'Espagne.

It was no sooner signed, and the hostages given, than the people repented, and mutinied. Their king, who suspected this, had fortified himself so strongly in the Alhambra, or palace, that he could not be forced; and having given notice to Don Ferdinand of his situation, his majesty immediately sent a letter, directed to the people, in which he told them, that if they did not disperse, and behave themselves quietly, the four hundred hostages they had given should be instantly put to the sword, the provisions they received daily withheld, and themselves sold for slaves, as the people had been at Malaga; and upon this, and the persuasions of their king, they retired dejectedly to those which they still called their houses. However, to prevent any thing of the like nature, the king gave their majesties notice, that, instead of the 6th of January, fixed by the capitulation, he would deliver up the place on the second<sup>n</sup>. This year the infanta Donna Isabella returned a widow from Portugal, her husband the prince Don Juan dying of a fall from his horse in the sports celebrated on occasion of their wedding, to the inex-

• LUC. MARIN. Sicul.

• HERN DEL PULGAR.

passage once opened, would accomplish all their purposes (2). The substance then of the capitulation was (3), that the king and commons of Granada should deliver that city, with all its gates, fortresses, towers, and other dependencies, with the arms and captives then in their possession, on the 6th of January; the inhabitants to continue in possession of their houses, goods, and inheritances, and to preserve the free exercise of their religion, with permission to live under their own laws, and to have their differences decided by their own judges: those who were desirous of retiring to Barbary, were to have passports for that purpose, with free licence to dispose of their effects, or, if they made it their choice, to carry them with them. As to the king, he was to have an ample seignory in the Alpujarras, and a certain number of vassals; but if this should not prove satisfactory, he might also demand leave to pass into Africa, and likewise receive the value of the territory which he left behind him. The Jews were absolutely excluded from this capitulation, because their majesties were determined to have the houses they occupied for Christian inhabitants, and the Moors had no such affection for them as to insist upon their being comprehended; tho', as the reader will see in the text, it would have been of little consequence if they had.

(2) Hernando de Pulgar, Anton. Nabriss. Luc. Marin. Sicul. y Excellencias de Granada, por Franc. Bermudez de Pedraza.

(3) Antigüedad y

pressible sorrow of both courts <sup>i</sup>. Their majesties also concluded an alliance with the emperor Maximilian, and a treaty of marriage for their daughter Joanna with the archduke Philip, and another alliance with king Henry VII. of England, and a like treaty of marriage between Arthur prince of Wales and the infanta Donna Catalina, or Catharine; both which important transactions passed in the new town of Santa Fé, to the inexpressible satisfaction of their catholic majesties, who, about this time, understanding that the president and counsellors of the chancery at Valladolid had admitted an appeal in a temporal cause to the court of Rome, dismissed them all from their employments <sup>k</sup>.

1491.

On the second of January, pursuant to his own proposition, the king of Granada disposed all things for delivering Don Ferdinand up that capital to their catholic majesties, who, on their parts, gave the necessary orders for taking possession of it, with all the precautions, as well as all the solemnity possible. For this purpose, the count de Tendilla, with cardinal Mendoza and Don Guttiery de Cardenas, were sent with a strong body of troops into the city, to take possession of the Alhambra, where they first elevated the banner of the cross upon the principal tower, and then the standard of the king and St. James on the other two; after which their majesties entered the place, and received the submission of the inhabitants <sup>l</sup>. Thus Granada returned into the possession of the Christians, after it had been held by the Moors 779 years, two months, and nine days. As for the unfortunate monarch of the Moors, he retired to Pukhena in the Alpujarros, where the king gave him a very considerable estate <sup>m</sup>. While their majesties resided at Granada, they published an edict, requiring all the Jews, who were not disposed to embrace the Christian faith, to quit their dominions in six months; and notwithstanding all possible methods were used by that unfortunate nation to prevent the execution of this law, they were obliged to quit Spain at the time <sup>n</sup>. Mariana has carried the calculation of those who retired into foreign countries, to 800,000 souls <sup>o</sup>. Those who speak with greater moderation, fix them at thirty thousand families <sup>p</sup>; and it is said that they carried with them immense riches, of a great part of which they were plundered in the countries to which they retired. Politicians are much divided in their sentiments upon this measure. At this juncture, Christopher Columbus,

*The king
Don Ferdinand in great danger of being assassinated.*

<sup>i</sup> MARIANA.<sup>k</sup> Lord BACON's History of Henry VII.<sup>l</sup> MARIANA.<sup>m</sup> ZURITA.<sup>n</sup> GARIBAY.<sup>o</sup> Hi-

toria General de España.

<sup>p</sup> Id, ibid.

after many difficulties and unwearied applications, signed the contract with the queen Donna Isabella, in the city of Santa Fé, on the 17th of April, for the discovery of new countries, which he accomplished with so much glory to himself, and with such advantages to the crown of Castile, the whole expence of his armament amounting to no more than 17,000 ducats; for obtaining which sum the queen would have pledged her jewels, if the comptroller of her household had not advanced it without taking any such security. On the death of pope Innocent VIII. who had solemnized with great magnificence at Rome the reduction of Granada, the famous Don Rodrigo Borgia, who was a native of Valentia, ascended the pontifical throne, and assumed the name of Alexander the Sixth *. In the autumn their majesties made a tour into Aragon, and from thence into Catalonia, where, in the city of Barcelona, Don Ferdinand ran an unexpected and imminent danger of losing his life; for having, according to his custom, given a long audience to all who desired it, on Friday the seventh of December, as he was passing down the stairs from his apartment, an idiot, whose name was Juan de Canameres, attempted to stab him with a knife over the shoulder, but luckily cut only his ear, and penetrated a little way into his chest. Those who were about the king would have dispatched him; but he prevented it; and understanding the truth, that the poor creature fancied he should succeed him in the throne, he added to the sentence passed upon him, importing that his body should be torn to pieces with pincers and then burnt to ashes, that he should first be strangled *.

1492.

Charles
VIII. of France
obliged to restore the county
of Roussillon.

CHARLES VIII. of France, having in view the conquest of the kingdom of Naples, where the people were excessively discontented, was inclined to cut short the negotiation that had been for some time depending with the crown of Spain, and to promise at least the restitution of the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne; and upon this a treaty was signed and sworn to on the 19th of January *. That monarch, however, had no real intention to restore these territories, but endeavoured all he could to frustrate and elude the engagements he had taken; but when Don Ferdinand began to assemble troops on the frontiers, and shewed a resolution to attempt the recovery of them by force, Charles thought fit to deliver them up; so that their majesties had the satisfaction of entering Perpignan in splendor, which had been withheld from them many years *. The duke of Cadiz having breathed

* ZURITA. * MARIANA, * ZURITA. * MAYER.
TURQUET. * MARIANA.

his

his last in the preceding year, their majesties thought it more expedient to give the title of duke of Arcos to his son Don Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, together with a certain number of vassals, and an annual pension, than to suffer the port and island of Cadiz to remain in the hands of that or any other family<sup>w</sup>. From the same principle the king Don Ferdinand prevailed upon the pope to fortify his title to the new discovered countries as far as was in his power, and, in virtue of his own, united to the crown the grand masterships of several military orders, which was a seasonable and important acquisition<sup>x</sup>. The nobility and commons of the kingdom of Naples sent over deputies to propose to the king the uniting that to his other crowns; and they were very desirous of remaining under the dominion of the house of Arragon; declaring, that they were quite tired of their present monarch, and had no hopes at all of his son; but the king, having heard patiently all they had to say, told them, that the ties of blood restrained him from attempting any thing to the prejudice of their sovereign, even supposing it might be done with justice; and that wherever they applied, they might possibly find a change of masters, without any alteration of circumstances<sup>y</sup>. Muly Abul Abdali, unable to remain a private man, and as unable to attempt any thing with success against their catholic majesties, resolved to retire into Barbary; and the king not only permitted him freely to transport himself and his family, but paid him also the full value of his estate in ready money<sup>z</sup>.

1493.

THE king Don Alonso of Naples, who had lately succeeded his father Don Ferdinand, demanded and received assurances of succour from the king Don Ferdinand, in case he was attacked. The last-mentioned monarch having received ambassadors from the king of France, to desire that he would grant some ports in the island of Sicily, for the war he intended to make against the Turks, and for asserting his right to the crown of Naples, Don Ferdinand promised to send an answer by ministers of his own. He did so, and suggested to him, that the war against Naples was very unjust, as being grounded on a very indifferent title bequeathed to him, and not to punish any insult against himself, or to assert any claim either of his own or from his ancestors; and that he would find, whatever it might be in the beginning, this war would prove fatal in its progress, and ruinous in its consequences. But notwithstanding these remonstrances were supported by some of the ablest ministers in France, Charles would not desist from his expedition; upon which Don Ferdinand made the necessary dispositions for assisting his allies <sup>a</sup>. About this time, perceiving that, from a spirit of ease and luxury, the nobility began to leave off the use of horses, and ride mostly upon mules, he forbade the use of those creatures for the saddle by any, except ecclesiastics and women, under very severe penalties; otherwise the valuable breed of horses in Spain had been very near lost <sup>b</sup>.

He resolves to undertake an expedition against Naples, tho' Don Ferdinand sent an embassy to dissuade him from it.

<sup>w</sup> LUC. MARIN. Sigul.<sup>x</sup> RAINALD.<sup>y</sup> ZURITA.<sup>z</sup> MARIANA.

1494.

The latter declares himself free from all engagements in the last treaty.

THE king of France having made a public entry into Rome, and obliged the pope to submit to him, Don Antonio de Fonseca, ambassador from their catholic majesties, presented to him their letter; upon which he promised to give him an audience at Veletri <sup>c</sup>. There, in a very full assembly of the princes and nobility, Fonseca declared to him, in the name of Don Ferdinand, that having reserved to himself, in the peace of Rouffillon, the right of taking up arms, in case the dominions of the church were attacked, and knowing nothing at that time of any claim pretended by him to the crown of Naples, he looked upon himself as absolved from all engagements, and would not fail to repel his unjust pretensions by force of arms; and, to convince the French king that his master was in earnest, he pulled that treaty out of his bosom, and tore it before his face; for which some of the French lords would have killed him, but the king prevented it <sup>d</sup>. Don Alonso of Naples perceiving that a strong spirit of disaffection prevailed amongst his subjects, who, at the same time, pretended to have a high esteem for his son the duke of Calabria, resigned the crown to him, and retired into Sicily <sup>e</sup>. This did not prevent the reduction of the best part of the kingdom by the French; but, while they pushed their conquests, Don Ferdinand negotiated a league, and formed such an army behind them, under the command of the marquis of Mantua, as obliged them to a precipitate and hazardous retreat <sup>f</sup>. He likewise sent over to Naples the famous Don Gonzales de Cordova, with a good fleet and a strong body of forces, with which, tho' unable to meet the French army in the field, yet, being bred in the Moorish way of fighting, he made use of so many stratagems, and laid so many ambuscades, that the French were afraid to stir out of their garrisons <sup>g</sup>. The king went in person into Aragon, in order to obtain the necessary supplies for attacking France thro'

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA.<sup>b</sup> MARIANA.<sup>c</sup> HERN. DEL PULGAR.<sup>d</sup> ZURITA.<sup>e</sup> Idem.<sup>f</sup> ANT. NEBRISS.<sup>g</sup> LUC.

MARIN. SICUL.

Biscay and Roussillon <sup>a</sup>. This year proved fatal to cardinal Mendoza archbishop of Toledo, who was succeeded by father Francis Ximenes, who will make a great figure in the future part of this history; and, towards the close of the year, died Don Alonso king of Naples <sup>i</sup>.

1495.

THE war with France on the side of Roussillon continued, The double tho' the operations of it were not very remarkable. However, Don Gonçales de Cordova having expelled the French marriages out of the kingdom of Naples, and thereby acquired the between glorious title of The Great Captain, induced Charles VIII. to the arch- propose a suspension of arms to Don Ferdinand, which was duke Phi- readily accepted <sup>k</sup>. The reciprocal marriages, which had lip and been some years before proposed to their catholic majesties, the infant now took place; and the Donna Joanna was sent on Donna Jo- board a strong squadron into Flanders, to espouse the arch- anna, and duke Philip; which squadron was to return with the arch- the infant duchess Margaret, who was to espouse Don Juan prince of princess Asturias <sup>l</sup>; and the other marriage was also perfected be- Margaret. tween Arthur prince of Wales and the princess Catharine; but it was agreed that the consummation of the marriage should be put off till his royal highness had attained the age of fourteen <sup>m</sup>. On the seventh of October died Don Ferdinand II. king of Naples, who was succeeded in the throne by his uncle Don Frederic; and that prince immediately demanded the assistance of Don Ferdinand, assuring him that his dominions and his person should be always at his devotion; with which the king was extremely pleased <sup>n</sup>. About two months before Don Ferdinand died, Donna Joanna, the widow of Don Juan the second, king of Castile, and the mother of queen Isabella, likewise departed this life, in a very advanced age, after having been subject for many years to great infirmities <sup>o</sup>. At this time, as Zurita assures us, <sup>1496.</sup> pope Alexander VI. bestowed the title of Catholic upon Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, tho' the Spanish writers make no scruple of bestowing on them this appellation throughout their whole reign <sup>p</sup>. The king Don Ferdinand, notwithstanding the French had taken some advantages upon the expiration of the last truce, which he found himself in a condition to have made them repent, yet, at their motion, the king thought it more convenient for his affairs to suffer a new suspension of arms to take place, which might afford him an opportunity of taking the proper measures to bring the great designs he had formed in his own mind to bear; yet he was not so much taken up with these political meditations as not to have his eyes open to all that happened in the countries adjacent, or not to improve any event that might be turned to his advantage. An instance of this appeared in Africa, where the kings of Fez and Tremecen, after a long war for the acquisition of the city of Melilla, which had extremely weakened both their forces, at length agreed that it should be, with all its district, left uninhabited, and serve in that respect as a common boundary to both their territories. The king Don Ferdinand had no sooner intelligence of this, than he sent orders to the duke de Medina Sidonia to use the utmost secrecy and dispatch in surprising that place; which commission, notwithstanding the difficulties that attended it, he executed with so much spirit and address, that, landing 5000 men, he took possession of the place, and, having put it in a state of defence, took such effectual measures for re-peopling it, that it was in a very little time out of all danger of being recovered by the Infidels.

<sup>a</sup> FERRERAS. <sup>i</sup> Hist. du Cardinal Ximenes, par M. ESPRIT FLECHIER, Eveque de Nismes. <sup>k</sup> GARIBAY. <sup>l</sup> ZURITA. <sup>m</sup> Lord BACON's History of Henry VII. <sup>n</sup> MARIANA. <sup>o</sup> ZURITA. <sup>p</sup> Annales Arragon.

Death of
the infant
Don Juan,
and marriage of the infant
Donna
Isabella.

THE pleasure which the king received from hence was in some measure, however, qualified by the news of a dispute that had happened between the garrison and the inhabitants of Perpignan, in compoling of which the governor Don Henry Henriquez received a blow upon the temples, of which he immediately died upon the spot<sup>s</sup>. As to the family-affairs of their catholic majesties, they suffered, in the compass of this year, very considerable alterations, and such as might have affected them alternately with the warmest sensations of pleasure, and with the deepest anxiety and regret. The return of their fleet from Flanders brought the princess Margaret of Austria into Spain, who was conducted in great ceremony to Burgas, where their catholic majesties then were, in order to her marriage with the prince of Asturias, and where, on the 4th of April, they received the nuptial benediction from the hands of the archbishop of Toledo, which filled the court with joy<sup>t</sup>. The king of Portugal not long after discovered the reason of his declining to accept the infant Donna Maria, with which their majesties were somewhat offended, by demanding the infant Donna Isabella, who, during her widowhood, had passed her time in acts of piety and devotion. Their majesties readily yielded to his request; but it was with some difficulty that the infant

<sup>s</sup> HERN. DEL PULGAR.
Angl.

<sup>t</sup> ZURITA.

<sup>t</sup> PET. MART.

could be brought to hear of a second marriage. At length, however, the treaty was concluded, and the king and queen conducted her towards the frontiers <sup>u</sup>; but, before the marriage was concluded, they received advice that the prince Don Juan was fallen ill at Salamanca, to which city the king his father returned, in whose arms that hopeful prince expired on the 4th of October <sup>w</sup>. His death being concealed from Donna Isabella, the marriage was celebrated between the king of Portugal and the infanta. Those who pretend to penetrate the decrees of Providence have suggested, that Don Ferdinand received this severe stroke at the very time that he had formed that unjust project of dividing the dominions of the king of Naples with the king of France. Whatever truth there may be in this conjecture, certain it is, that the princess dowager of Asturias, being left big with child, miscarried soon after of a daughter, by which all the remaining hopes they had of that marriage were totally extinguished <sup>x</sup>.

1497.

In the succeeding year the king and queen of Portugal made a visit to their parents at Toledo, where they were entertained with equal affection and magnificence, and received the homage of the states of Castile; after which they proceeded to Saragossa, and were in like manner acknowledged by the states of Arragon <sup>y</sup>. If this, in some measure, consoled their catholic majesties for the death of their only son, their satisfaction lasted not long; for, on the 23d of August, the young queen, being brought to bed of a son at Saragossa, expired an hour after <sup>z</sup>. This year the king concluded a peace with Lewis XII. soon after his accession to the throne of France <sup>a</sup>. He likewise sent, in conjunction with his son-in-law the king of Portugal, ambassadors to Rome, to admonish the pope of his duty, to require him to mind his family less and his pontifical dignity more; but the motives to, and the consequences of, this extraordinary proceeding, will appear in their proper place, when we come to speak of that pontif, and his scandalous administration <sup>b</sup>.

The death of that princess, then queen of Portugal, on a visit to her parents.

1498.

THE first care of their catholic majesties was to cause the young prince Don Michael to be acknowledged heir of Castile; and the like care was taken in Portugal <sup>c</sup>. About this time it was that king Ferdinand concluded with Lewis XII. a secret treaty for the division of the kingdom of Naples between them; the motives to which are not very clearly expressed by any of the Spanish historians. What they deliver upon this bishops of Toledo

General conversion of the Moors in the new conquests by the arch-

<sup>u</sup> BERNALDEZ.<sup>w</sup> PET. MART. Angl.<sup>x</sup> ZURITA.<sup>y</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>z</sup> PET. MART. Angl.<sup>a</sup> ZURITA.<sup>b</sup> MARIANA.<sup>c</sup> GARIBAY.

and Granada.

subject; may be reduced to this; that Don Frederick had refused to marry his son to the princess Joanna, his catholic majesty's niece; and that having made overtures of an alliance to the king of France, he had transmitted to him Don Ferdinand's letters, which the latter could never forgive. The former conjecture seems to be in some measure confirmed by the return of the queen dowager Donna Joanna of Naples, with her daughter, into Spain, where the king appointed them the city of Valentia for their residence, with an establishment suitable to their rank and near relation to him<sup>d</sup>. Their majesties being informed, during their residence in the kingdom of Granada, that the greatest part of the inhabitants held secret intelligence with their countrymen in Barbary; invited them to make descents upon the coast, favoured them in these predatory expeditions, and shared with them in the booty; upon which it was thought a necessary resolution to oblige these people to embrace the Christian religion, or to embark for Africa. The archbishops of Toledo and Granada were charged with the execution of this project, in which they both laboured with equal diligence, tho' by very different methods. The primate had a high and hasty spirit, tho' with very great abilities; the other prelate not at all inferior to him in the last-mentioned quality, was remarkably mild and gentle, applying himself chiefly to the conversion of the more learned among the Mohammedans, upon whom he made great impressions by the strength of his arguments and the smoothness of his conduct. Between both, and by the assistance of the civil arm, the people in general were converted, or said to be converted; insomuch that, on the 18th of December; the principal mosque was consecrated, and turned into a christian cathedral<sup>e</sup>.

1499.

This appears to be but insincere, from a general insurrection.

THE next year it plainly appeared, that these sentiments were not so general or sincere as they had been represented; for the greatest part of the inhabitants of the Alpujarros threw off the Spanish yoke, and sent agents into Barbary to demand the assistance of their countrymen, in support of a war grounded solely upon religion; but, before they had time to bring their affairs into any tolerable order, the king Don Ferdinand arrived at Granada, and, marching from thence with a formidable army, quickly reduced these unhappy people, notwithstanding the natural strength of that country which they inhabited; so that, on the 8th of March, they made a solemn submission, consented to pay the sum of 50,000 ducats, by way of fine, for their late insurrection, and to give thirty-two hostages for their future obedience <sup>f</sup>. The king Don Frederick of Naples, having some intelligence of the storm that was ready to burst upon himself and his dominions, addressed himself with great humility to Don Ferdinand, offered to conclude the marriage which he had before refused, and to put his dominions under his protection; to which the king, for reasons that will hereafter appear, returned only general answers <sup>g</sup>. In the month of May, the Great Captain, with a strong fleet, sailed to Sicily, under pretence of defending that island from the Turks, but in reality to execute the treaty of partition concluded with the crown of France; towards which, even in the compass of this year, he made no inconsiderable progress <sup>h</sup>. The archduchess Donna Joanna being delivered on the 24th of February of a son, who was baptized by the name of Charles, in respect to the memory of the duke of Burgundy, his grandfather, the news was received with great joy in Spain <sup>i</sup>, where, on the 20th of July, the young prince Don Michael breathed his last; which did not hinder the conclusion of the marriage of Don Manuel king of Portugal with the infanta Donna Maria, who was first offered him, the sister of his former wife, and aunt of the young prince, whose death we have just mentioned <sup>k</sup>.

THE disturbances that had hitherto happened in the new Another conquests were of little consequence in comparison of those revolt in that broke out this year, either from the chagrin and obsti- those parts nacy of the Moors, or from the avarice and severity of those much more appointed to govern them. The places that revolted were dangerous chiefly castles in the mountains, where the people depended and trou- partly on the advantages arising from their situation, and blesome partly on the strength of those forts. As to the latter, they than the were quickly convinced of their error, by their being almost former. as quickly reduced as they were invested. However, they began to entertain strong prejudices in favour of the former, from several advantages they gained over the Christian troops, and particularly one in which Don Alonso de Aguilar was cut to pieces, and with him almost all the detachment he commanded <sup>l</sup>. To repair these mischiefs, the king Don Ferdinand gave orders for disposing his troops in such a manner, that all intercourse with the people in the Alpujarres was rendered impracticable. He then marched against them in person with a formidable army, and opened the passages as he went, so as to render the entrance of troops into it much more easy than before. This took from the Moors all courage; and therefore they offered to submit, if the king would permit them to retire into Barbary. A great part of the council thought this dishonourable, considering them as just objects of the king's resentment; but those, upon whom the king chiefly relied, insisted that the true point of honour was to accomplish his design, and to do it in the speediest and safest manner. The king, therefore, consented to their demand, provided they paid him ten pistoles a family; and, by this expedient, he raised 60,000 pistoles, which was a great sum in those days, and got quit of at least as many people, who never would have been quiet <sup>m</sup>. This year the pope gave his consent to the treaty of partition, by which Lewis XII. of France was to have Naples and Abruzzo, with the title of king, and Don Ferdinand the two Calabrias, with the country of Apuglia <sup>n</sup>. The Great Captain soon put him in possession of his share, and the unfortunate Don Frederick king of Naples made it his choice to retire into France, there to expect a subsistence from the generosity of that prince who had despoiled him of the other half of his dominions <sup>o</sup>. On the 21st of August, the princess Catharine embarked for England; but, meeting with a violent storm, was forced to put back, and did not sail again till the 21st of September <sup>p</sup>. Donna Isabella, by the advice of Ximenes archbishop of Toledo, engaged, or rather obliged, Don Ferdinand to concur with her in a solemn invitation of the archduke Philip and the princess Joanna to come into Spain, in order to be acknowledged the legal successors of their dominions; a thing she had just reason to desire; but the king, who was sixteen years younger, had other notions in his head, which rendered this expedient not very acceptable; but as these objections could not be avowed, he complied with her request, and prudently concealed them <sup>q</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>g</sup> HERN. DEL PULC.<sup>h</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>i</sup> PET. MART. Angl.<sup>k</sup> BERNALDEZ.<sup>l</sup> ZURITA.

Archduke
Philip and Donna
Joanna
acknow-leged successors by the states
of Ca-
stile.

AMONGST other things, their catholic majesties were extremely careful in recovering to the crown those places which, through the easiness of their predecessors, had been granted from it, and which it was not either honourable or safe to leave in the hands of subjects. The important fortress and port of Gibraltar was very justly esteemed of this number; and therefore their majesties, by giving, no doubt, a proper equivalent, obtained it from the duke de Medina Sidonia, by whose ancestor it was retaken, and annexed it to the crown <sup>r</sup>. The archduke Philip, and the princess Joanna, his

<sup>m</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>n</sup> LUC. MARIN. Sicul.

<sup>o</sup> ZURITA.

<sup>p</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>q</sup> GARIBAY.

<sup>r</sup> PULGAR.

consort, arrived in Spain, having travelled through France pretty early in the year; but as many precautions were necessary in an affair of so delicate a nature, it was the 21st of May before they received the oaths of the states of Castile in the cathedral church of Toledo; and it was the latter end of September before the like ceremony was performed at Saragossa, where the states of Aragon swore to them conditionally, in case the king Don Ferdinand left no heirs male*. Affairs in Italy were still in a critical situation: the French monarch sent an ambassador to complain of the ill usage his subjects had received from the Grand Captain. Don Ferdinand answered, like a great politician, that he was very desirous, if possible, of being upon good terms with his brother of France; and therefore, if he thought the treaty of partition unequal, he would accept his share, or he would leave the points in dispute to arbitrators, or even to the decision of a certain number of learned persons, who should be appointed judges to hear and determine all disputes; but, notwithstanding this seemingly pacific disposition, the war continued in Italy, where the Spaniards under the Grand Captain encroached daily upon the French†.

THE war breaking out also between the emperor and All en- France, put the archduke Philip upon returning into his own dominions, for the safety of which he was very apprehensive. It was in vain that Don Ferdinand hinted to him, that this sudden return was what he did not expect, after the pains that had been taken to secure to him the succession of so many kingdoms; in vain the queen, who was but just recovered from a dangerous illness, represented that his quitting Spain would have bad effects upon a nation by no means inclined to submit to foreigners; in vain the infanta Donna Joanna put him in mind that she was big with child, and that the depth of winter was a very improper season for travelling. The archduke persisted in his first resolution, nor would he be diverted from going through France; and accordingly set out from Madrid the 19th of December, leaving the people displeased, their majesties amazed, and his consort inconsolable‡. This year also the princess Catherine, who had espoused Arthur prince of Wales, became a widow, and, by consent of their majesties, was afterwards married to his younger brother Henry, and became afterwards queen of England, and mother of another queen§. This year also died at Rome Andrew Paleologus, despot of treaties to detain the archduke in Spain prove altogether ineffectual.

1502.

* PULGAR.      † ANTON. NEBRISS.      § PET. MART. Angl.      ¶ Lord BACON's Hist. of Henry VII.

the Morea, and the nephew of the last emperor of Constantinople, who, by his last will and testament, dated the sixth of April, transferred all his claims to their majesties, and their successors <sup>x</sup>.

The archduke concludes a treaty
with France,
which the king Don Ferdin-
and disapproves.

As soon as the archduke Philip could procure a passport for that purpose, he went to Lyons, in order to have an interview with the French king, with whom he entered into a negotiation; of which Don Ferdinand having intelligence, he sent father Bernard Boyle to admonish him not to depart from the instructions which he had given him; notwithstanding which, he signed such an accommodation as he judged expedient; of which his father-in-law being apprehensive, he dispatched an order to the Grand Captain in Italy to pay no obedience to any commands he received but from himself; and, as soon as he was informed of it, disavowed the treaty; which so irritated king Lewis, that he not only invaded Roussillon, but attempted to penetrate into Aragon, though with no great success; whereas Don Ferdinand, having obliged him to raise the siege of Salces, carried the horrors of war into France, and compelled Lewis to demand a truce for a few months; to which he consented <sup>y</sup>. The war still continued in Italy with various success; but, upon the whole, was favourable to the Spaniards, the king taking care to send, from time to time, great supplies and strong reinforcements by sea. On the 10th of March, the princess Donna Joanna was delivered at Alcala of a son, whom the archbishop of Toledo baptized by the name of Ferdinand <sup>z</sup>; and, in this lying in, it is believed that the infanta, by some accident, had her understanding impaired; at least soon after she gave very visible marks of an alienation of mind, from which she could never be recovered.

Donna
Isabella,
queen of Castile,
dies, after a long and tedious distemper.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, it was found absolutely necessary to send the infanta Donna Joanna to her husband in Flanders, as her malady chiefly arose from her excessive passion for the archduke <sup>a</sup>. A truce was likewise concluded in the spring with his most Christian majesty. On Good Friday, the 5th of April, there was a terrible earthquake, which was felt through the greatest part of Spain and which the common people esteemed ominous, more especially as both their majesties fell dangerously ill <sup>b</sup>. However, the king recovered; but the profound melancholy the queen strengthened her disease. The loss of her son

<sup>x</sup> PET. MART. Angl.

<sup>y</sup> PULGAR.

<sup>z</sup> ZURIT

<sup>a</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>b</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET.

Don Juan first seized her spirits; the misfortunes of the infant Donna Isabella increased her affliction; and her sense of the infant Donna Joanna's incapacity, and the apprehension she was under as to its consequences, rendered the load of her cares too heavy for her to support. By her testament she called her daughter to the succession, and, after her, the prince Don Carlos; but appointed her husband Don Ferdinand regent of the kingdom till her grandson should attain the age of twenty; directing her body to be interred at Granada, and forbidding any public mourning upon her demise. In this disposition of mind, universally bewailed and regretted, died this great queen, on the 26th of November 1504<sup>c</sup>, about half an hour before noon; and as soon as a scaffold could be erected in the square of Medina del Campo, where she died, the king caused the archduchess Joanna to be proclaimed with the usual solemnities<sup>d</sup>. The Great Captain was now in a manner the peaceable possessor of the kingdom of Naples; and as, in the achieving and maintaining that conquest, he had been obliged to take some extraordinary steps, there wanted not those who did him ill offices with the king Don Ferdinand, which induced that monarch to restrain his authority; and as, upon the death of the queen, he might have found means to have retorted this ill usage, the king was not altogether free from apprehension; but Don Gonçales quickly convinced him, by his steady attachment, that all which had been reported to his prejudice was but calumny<sup>e</sup>.

1504.

THE affairs of both courts, and the councils of both kings, were in a short time equally embarrassed. Don Ferdinand found that the greatest part of the nobility were by no means satisfied with his regency, but were rather desirous of having their young king Philip, who, they flattered themselves, would be more tractable, and who, they were sure, would be less capable of managing public affairs. The duke of Najara, and the famous Don Diego de Pacheco marquis of Villena, were at the head of the malecontents, and they sent Don Juan Manuel into Flanders, to fill the mind of their new master with such notions as might best answer their purpose<sup>f</sup>. On the side of his catholic majesty were the constable and the admiral of Castile, Don Bernard Mendoza, and, above all, the archbishop of Toledo and the duke of Alva, who ad-

Jealousies and uneasinesses arise between Ferdinand and the archduke.

<sup>c</sup> FERRERAS.    <sup>d</sup> ZURITA.    <sup>e</sup> FERRERAS.    <sup>f</sup> ESTEVAN DE GARIB. Compendio Historial de las Cronicas y universal Historia de todos los Reynos de Espana, fol. Barcelona, 1628.

hered to him steadily, when visibly abandoned by all others, and seemingly by his good-fortune<sup>g</sup>. The archduke, king of Castile, had conceived very high prejudices against his father-in-law, and affected to treat the queen's testament as a supposititious piece, and as invalid, if it was not so; neither did he make any scruple of declaring that no throne could admit of two kings; and that he meant to maintain his right to govern without an associate, to those who had sworn to his succession<sup>h</sup>. An accident happened, which provoked him to carry things still farther: one of his catholic majesty's ambassadors had prevailed upon queen Joanna to corroborate her mother's act, by sending Don Ferdinand full power to govern Castile, and its dependencies; upon the discovery of which, the archduke dismissed all the queen's servants, forbid any Spaniard to speak to her, and threw the ambassador into a dungeon<sup>i</sup>. In Spain, whatever passed in his mind, Don Ferdinand behaved with all the temper and condescension of a prince absolutely at his ease. He held an assembly of the states at Toro, and brought thither an excellent code of laws, that had been digested with great deliberation before the queen's death; and the desire of having these enacted, made such an impression that the king and queen were proclaimed, and Don Ferdinand acknowledged as administrator, almost without any opposition<sup>k</sup>. His jealousy of the power of the Great Captain in Naples had induced him to recal part of his army from thence, which might have proved a dangerous measure, if the archbishop of Toledo had not immediately suggested employing them in a war against the Moors, of which he bore the whole expence; and the army being transported to Africa, reduced the port and town of Mazalquivir<sup>l</sup>. Having exact intelligence of all that passed in Flanders, and knowing that his son-in-law was on the point of engaging with Lewis XII. to support him in his pretensions, Don Ferdinand broke all his measures, by proposing a marriage with the neice of that monarch, and entailing upon the heirs of it, male or female, the kingdom of Naples. The name of this young and beautiful princess was Germain de Foix, and the marriage was very speedily concluded<sup>m</sup>. Upon this the French monarch declared for Don Ferdinand, which obliged the archduke to conclude a kind of treaty of pacification by his ministers at Salamanca, in which it was stipulated, that the queen and the two kings should govern with equal authority; with various other articles,

<sup>g</sup> BERNALDEZ.
RIANA.

<sup>h</sup> ZURITA.
FERRERAS.

<sup>i</sup> MARIN. Sic.

<sup>k</sup> MA-

<sup>l</sup> MEZERAY.

which it is unnecessary to mention, since this pacification never took effect, and was concluded only to gain the archduke a peaceable admission into Spain, where his intention was that his faction should set it aside, which they did very effectually <sup>a</sup>. In the mean time the queen was delivered of the infanta Donna Maria; on which Don Ferdinand sent a person of distinction to compliment the king and queen, who was received with respect, though Philip persisted in his first resolution, and was taking at that very time such measures as he thought most expedient for its execution <sup>o</sup>, and for undermining the authority of his father-in-law. 1505.

On the tenth of January, the archduke, with the queen The arch- his consort, embarked at Middleburgh for Spain; but, being duke Phi- forced by a tempest to take shelter in an English port, Henry lip goes to the seventh would not suffer him to depart till they had an Spain, and interview at Windsor, where himself and his queen were re- dispossesses ceived with all possible magnificence and respect, the two his father- kings entering into a close alliance, and the queen being ex- in-law of tremely delighted with the conversation of her sister the the re- princess of Wales; but, however, his stay of six weeks is reported not to have been altogether voluntary, and what seems to give some colour to this suggestion is, that the Eng- lish monarch engaged him, before his departure, to deliver up Edmund de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, who had been kept prisoner in the citadel of Namur from the time that Arthur, prince of Wales, had espoused the infanta; with a promise, however, that his life should be safe <sup>p</sup>, as it was during that reign, though he was beheaded in the next <sup>q</sup>. This affair settled, which did no great honour to either of the kings, the archduke continued his voyage, and landed safely at Corunna. The first step he took was, to declare he would not be bound by the treaty of Salamanca, and that he expected his father-in-law should abdicate the regency, and retire into his own dominions. Don Ferdinand, finding himself abandoned by every-body except the primate of Toledo and the duke of Alva, resolved to yield to the torrent, and sent the archbishop to his son, to prevail upon him to consent to an interview, which was obtained with great difficulty, and upon the strangest terms imaginable. The young king advanced to it with six thousand men, in order of battle. Don Ferdinand had his ordinary retinue of about two hundred men, mounted upon mules with cloaks, but without swords, ac-

<sup>a</sup> ÉST. DE GARIBAY.<sup>o</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.<sup>p</sup> Lord BACON's History of Henry VII.<sup>q</sup> Lord HERaccompanied by the duke of Alva, in whose single person was comprised his whole court. Philip looked very grave, and put on an air of state and majesty; Don Ferdinand, on the contrary, appeared very open and gay, and, while his son presented one by one the nobility who had deserted him, he received them smiling, and rallied every one of them; so that the scheme of mortifying him was totally defeated.

BERT's History of Henry VIII.

Philip dies unexpectedly, and thereby throws Castile into great confusion.

THEY conferred in a hermitage, to which they were attended by Ximenes and Don Juan Manuel. The presence of the latter disconcerted the old king; but the primate of Toledo delivered him from his perplexity, by desiring Don Juan to leave the kings alone; and, he going out first, the archbishop shut the door, and returned to the two princes. The conference produced nothing; but a treaty was afterwards concluded, by which Don Ferdinand consented to retire into his own dominions; and the archduke, with some difficulty, allowed him to keep the three grand masterships, and assigned him the profits of a silk farm in the kingdom of Granada, amounting to fifty thousand crowns. They had, before Don Ferdinand retired, another interview, in which Don Ferdinand gave his son a great deal of good advice, and particularly recommended to him the archbishop Ximenes, as one of the best men and the ablest minister that Spain had ever bred. When the old king returned with his young wife to Saragossa, the duke of Alva would have accompanied him, but he absolutely forbade it. In the month of July Don Philip held an assembly of the states at Valladolid, where they swore to the queen Donna Joanna in her own right, to the king as her husband, and to the prince Don Carlos as the heir apparent, and gave him a subsidy for the war against the Moors. It was not long before the new government became universally odious; for, not content with treating his wife harshly, and with contempt, he laboured to persuade the nobility to deprive her of the government, and to shut her up as a mad woman, which was prevented by the firmness of the admiral and the duke of Benavente. He quarrelled with the inquisition, changed all the governors and magistrates throughout Spain, and suffered his Flemish favourites to sell every thing. Upon this, great troubles were like to ensue; some of the nobility entered into a league for setting the queen at liberty; and the people universally exclaimed, that they never knew the value of Don Ferdinand's

* EST. DE GARIBAY.

Ximen.

MART. Angl. epist.

* ALV. GOMEZ, de reb. gest.

* ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

* PET.

administration till they were deprived of it; but the consequences of this universal discontent were averted by the king's sudden death, occasioned by violent exercise after a full meal, and then drinking cool liquor, which produced a fever that carried him off in six days, on the 25th of September, in twenty-eighth year of his age <sup>w</sup>. He left the queen big with child, having had by her the prince Don Carlos his successor; the infant Don Ferdinand, afterwards emperor; the infantas Donna Eleonora, Donna Isabella, and Donna Maria, who, with his posthumous daughter Donna Catalina, were all queens, the first of Portugal and afterwards of France, the second of Denmark, the third of Hungary, and the last of Portugal <sup>x</sup>. 1506.

THE affairs of Castile, by the unfortunate and unexpected death of the king, were thrown into the utmost confusion; the great lords, to preserve some form of government, appointed a committee of seven, with the archbishop of Toledo at their head. That prelate went to the queen, and desired her to sign the necessary instruments for calling an assembly of the states; which she absolutely refused, repeating continually, "The king my father will come, and settle all things" <sup>y</sup>. His catholic majesty was at that time in Italy; and, though he received the news of his son-in-law's death, in the Genoese territories, yet he persisted in his resolution of going to Naples. This increased the confusion in Castile, where there were two parties formed, at the head of one of which was the archbishop of Toledo, in favour of Don Ferdinand; and into the other, the duke of Najara, the marquis of Villena, and others, entered, who were for calling in the emperor Maximilian. The committee of regency assembled the states, and, by the great address of the archbishop of Toledo, the party of the catholic king prevailed <sup>z</sup>. The queen in the mean time took away her husband's corpse, under pretence of carrying it to Granada, and wandered with it through the country, travelling by night only, and giving frequent signs of outrageous distraction; but withal had some lucid intervals, in which she expressed a great jealousy for her authority; and in one of these she forbade the deputies of the states from going to invite her father, notwithstanding she desired nothing so much as his return <sup>a</sup>. In the mean time some of the grandees were for marrying her again. The marquis of Villena proposed Don Alonso of

The principal nobility agree to settle a council, and to recall Don Ferdinand.

<sup>w</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>x</sup> GOES OSORIO.

<sup>y</sup> HERN.

DE PULGAR, vid. del Card. Ximen.

<sup>z</sup> ALV. GOMEZ,

de reb. gest. Ximen.

<sup>a</sup> FERRERAS.

Arragon, son to the infant Don Henry, the last heir male of the royal family; others were for Don Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, some say with her father's consent; Gaston de Foix, his brother-in-law, was named; and some mention there was of Henry the seventh, of England<sup>b</sup>. All these projects, however, were vain and fruitless, for the queen would never suffer even the most distant proposal of another marriage. The king Don Ferdinand settled every thing in Naples to his satisfaction; and, in pursuance of his treaty with the king of France, he restored such of the nobility to their estates as had been in the French interest; but it was observed, that, in holding the general assembly of the states, he took care that the queen should be absent, that the succession might be open for his grandson Don Carlos<sup>c</sup>. This year died the famous admiral Columbus, one of the ablest men in every respect of that or indeed of any other age, whose capacity was only equalled by his virtues and by his good fortune<sup>d</sup>.

He returns from Italy into Spain,
and resumes the regency of Castile.

1507.

THE malecontents in Spain, who were numerous and potent, but who thought themselves more so than they were, invited the emperor Maximilian to assume the government of Spain, as tutor to his grandson Don Carlos. They caballed likewise with the king of Navarre, to grant him a passage through his dominions with an army; to which he willingly assented, and for which he afterwards paid dear; and with the king of Portugal, to support the measure; to which he listened, till he saw it was a chimera<sup>e</sup>. Maximilian, however, sent ambassadors to Don Ferdinand at Naples, to demand the regency of Castile; but the king answered, there was no regency: that his daughter queen Joanna governed in her own right; and that it might prejudice, but could never turn to the benefit of the emperor's affairs, to intermeddle with those of Castile. Maximilian made another attempt, and offered Don Ferdinand the title of emperor of Italy, which he refused; and, upon this, the ambassadors protested against his returning to Spain till the dispute about the regency was determined. The king told them, there was no such dispute, and set out for Savona, where he had a conference with Lewis the twelfth, at whose request the Grand Captain made the third at their table<sup>f</sup>. In the mean time the queen was delivered at Turquemada of the infant

<sup>b</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

<sup>c</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>d</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>e</sup> GOES.

<sup>f</sup> ANTONIO DE HERRERA, Comentarios de Hechos de los Espanoles en Italia fol. Madrid, 1624.

Donna Catalina, on the 14th of June; and the plague raging in the town, and the queen not being to be persuaded to leave it, the archbishop of Toledo permitted all who would to depart, but remained with her himself, and at length prevailed on her to go to the village of Hornillos <sup>z</sup>. The catholic king landed in the kingdom of Valencia on the twentieth of July, went from thence into Castile, and conferred with the queen his daughter, who had always some degree of sense in his presence, and who immediately gave him full powers to govern the dominions of Castile in her name; and two years afterwards, at his request, retired to the castle of Tordesillas, a very pleasant place, six leagues from Valladolid, where she spent the remainder of her days <sup>h</sup>. The kingdom was in great confusion, and the greatest part of the nobility discontented; but the king having procured the dignity of a cardinal for the archbishop of Toledo, and, of his own motive, adding the office of inquisitor general, vacant by the death of the archbishop of Seville, secured by his means the clergy, and, by his own equity and moderation, the lesser nobility and the people, governed with his usual firmness, and was, generally speaking, well obeyed <sup>i</sup>. The emperor Maximilian could not be persuaded that he had no title to the regency of Castile, the revenues of which were so considerable, and to which the Indies were a valuable appendix; but as he was unable to give the catholic king much disturbance himself, he proposed the marriage of the queen Joanna to the king of England; and spread a report, that he had lately concluded a treaty with that prince, in consequence of which he was fitting out a fleet to invade Spain. Don Ferdinand knew this to be a fable; but, pretending to believe it, raised forces, fitted out a fleet, and secured the coasts so effectually, that the malecontents in the emperor's interest were caught in a net of their own weaving, since, without this colour, Ferdinand could not have procured the means to put his kingdom in a state of defence <sup>k</sup>. The king proceeded next to arrest the bishop of Badajoz, who had entered into some treasonable practices against his person; and upon the emperor's sending Andreas del Burgo, whom he had banished as a disturber of the public peace, with the title of his ambassador, he ordered him to depart his dominions. In this situation of things the malecontent lords laboured to revive the old factions in great towns, which by degrees would have raised a flame through all the territories of Castile.

<sup>z</sup> HERNANDO DE PULGAR, Vid. del Card. Ximen. <sup>h</sup> Est. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>i</sup> ALV. GÓMEZ, de reb. gest. Ximen.

<sup>k</sup> PET. MART. Ang. Epist.

As therein with great spirit and firmness against all opposition.

THE first insurrection happened at Cordova, where a great deal of mischief was done. The king sent the provost of his household to inquire into the tumult, and to punish the authors of it. Upon his arrival, the marquis de Priego sent him an order in writing to quit the place, as a disturber of the public peace. The provost copied his own order, subscribed it, and directed it to the marquis; who was so incensed at this insult to a man of his quality, that he seized and sent him prisoner to one of his fortresses. The catholic king, as soon as he was informed of it, marched with an army towards Cordova, notwithstanding the constable, the duke of Alva, and almost all the Spanish nobility, interceded for the marquis. The Grand Captain, who was that lord's uncle, advised him to surrender himself, and all that he had, into the king's hands; which he did, but without obtaining pardon. The king, however, would not restrain his person, but assigned him a pleasant village for his prison; after which, he sent a commission to Cordova, where the first authors of the revolt were hanged, some others banished, the marquis of Priego forbid to enter the city of Cordova, or the country of Andaluzia, without the king's leave, all his fortresses taken from him, and that of Montilla, in which he had imprisoned the king's provost, razed to the ground<sup>1</sup>. This increased the discontent of the nobility, but it kept them very quiet. The emperor sent Don Pedro Guevara and Alonso Romero, who was servant to the marquis of Villena, with secret instructions to his partisans, who entered the kingdom in disguise, and, being apprehended, were put to the torture; the former disclosed all he knew, but the latter would not speak a word<sup>m</sup>. The Moors having taken from the Portuguese the town of Arzile, Count Pedro Navarro and Ramiro de Guzman, by order of his catholic majesty, assisted them to recover it; which gave the king Don Emanuel such satisfaction, that he sent each of them a present of six thousand crusadoes, which they refused, as having only executed their master's order. Don Emanuel, upon this, sent a person of rank to thank his catholic majesty, but at the same time to complain, that Pedro and Ramiro had taken the island and fortress of Pegnon de Velez, which depended upon the kingdom of Fez, a part of Africa the Portuguese had a right to conquer. Don Ferdinand answered, that from this island the Moors made descents upon the kingdom of Granada; that the taking it had cost some blood, and the keeping it would be attended with a great expence, which, if Don Emanuel was inclined to defray, it was at his service<sup>n</sup>.

1508.

<sup>1</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>m</sup> PET. MART. Epist.

At the time the king had inflamed the malecontent lords to the highest degree, cardinal Ximenes undertook to mediate for them, and, by a dextrous application to their passions, drew from each the secret cause of their dislike to the king, which, as he acted by his direction, he communicated to him; and Don Ferdinand, sending for them singly, and as it were by accident, gratified each in his demand, or gave him an equivalent, upon which the emperor quickly found that in Spain there were no malecontents<sup>o</sup>. The league of Cambray, which had been concluded the year before against the Venetians, by the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and the catholic king, for himself and his daughter, was in the beginning of this proclaimed in Spain; and the king having referred the dispute between himself and the emperor to the cardinal of Robin, he pronounced that the catholic king should govern Spain till Don Carlos was of the age of five-and-twenty: that the latter should not take the title of king while his mother lived; and that the catholic king should give them each a pension of fifty thousand ducats, and assist the emperor against the Venetians; which decree he accepted and ratified<sup>p</sup>. On the third of March was born the infant Don Juan of Arragon, who died within a few days<sup>q</sup>. About this time cardinal Ximenes procured the king's leave to undertake the conquest of Oran, from whence it was evident that great advantages would arise to the nation. The troops to be employed were ten thousand foot and four thousand horse; the cardinal was to name his own officers, and command in person; the king was to furnish nothing except a fleet to transport them; and Oran, which was at that time a very flourishing place, and a kind of republic under the protection of the king of Tremecen, was to remain, if conquered, to the cardinal, and his successors in the see of Toledo, till the king should repay the charges of this expedition<sup>r</sup>.

THE cardinal employed under him count Pedro Navarro, and signor Vianelli, his intimate acquaintance, who both proved false and ungrateful, and, by their emissaries, excited a mutiny amongst the troops before they embarked, which

<sup>n</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA.

del Card. Ximen.

ALANA.

<sup>o</sup> HERNANDO DE PULGAR, Vid.

<sup>p</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>q</sup> MA-

<sup>r</sup> ALV. GOMEZ, de reb. gest. Ximen.

Oran undertaken by cardinal
Ximenes.

the cardinal quieted by his presence. They differed again before they debarked; Navarro and Vianelli, with most of the officers, were for deferring it till the morning, esteeming it dangerous to enter the port of Mazalquivir in the night. However, the cardinal would be obeyed, and entered the port without the loss of a shallop. Upon the landing there was a third dispute; for they insisted, that, considering the nature of the ground, cavalry would be useless; but two thousand horse were landed, and the vessels with the other two thousand on board, were ordered by the cardinal to proceed directly for Oran *. In the morning the cardinal, having harangued his army, and given them his blessing, retired at their earnest request to the fortress of Mazalquivir. The Moors were surprised to find the Christians in order of battle at break of day, and much more so when they found themselves terribly cannonaded from the fleet. However, from the advantage of ground, and superiority of numbers, they defended themselves gallantly till they saw the Christian colours flying upon the towers of Oran; for the cardinal had secret intelligence in the place, which he never discovered, by whom a thousand of the horse dismounted were let in at one of the gates; and another body of horse, in conjunction with those first landed, dissipated and destroyed the Moorish army, when it once began to break. The cardinal, having completed his design before one half of the provisions and ammunition which he had provided were expended, made a present of the whole to the army, and left the command to Don Pedro Navarro, who assumed the title of general of his catholic majesty's forces, and, with that character, conquered the city and kingdom of Bugia, forced the kings of Tunis and Tremecen to become tributaries, as also the city of Algiers, and performed other great exploits, till, pushing his conquests too far, he suffered a defeat, and lost the best part of his troops. As for the cardinal, he retired as privately after his return as he could to Alcala, where he was then founding a university; and not only refused applause, but declined appearing in public, in order to avoid it †. It was this year that the king prevailed upon his daughter to remove to Tordesillas, himself residing for the most part at Valladolid, from whence making her frequent visits, and carrying persons of the highest quality with him, he obliged her to quit the indecent habit she wore, and, having placed 1509.

* HERNANDO DE PULGAR. Vid. del Card. Ximen.
DE GARIBAY.

† EST.

several

several ladies of great rank about her, brought her to live in quite another manner than she had done<sup>u</sup>.

THE king Don Ferdinand went the next year into Arragon, to hold the states of that kingdom at Moncon, and in the mean time left the administration in Castile to cardinal Ximenes<sup>w</sup>. Upon his return in the autumn, several of the grandees of Castile, who had disputes with each other, which they durst not decide after the old method, by arms, and which they thought, it beneath them to leave to the law, went of themselves to the king, and desired that he would decide them, which he did, not as regent, but as an umpire, voluntarily chosen by the parties; and, which is very singular, generally contented both sides; and by this expedient many feuds were extinguished which had lasted through several generations<sup>x</sup>. On the sixth of October he opened an assembly of the states at Madrid; and there, in pursuance of his composition with the emperor, swore well and faithfully to administer the government, and likewise obtained a considerable subsidy for defraying the expence of the war against the Moors<sup>y</sup>. In Italy, the king and the pope, having received satisfaction from the Venetians, detached themselves in effect from the league of Cambray; and though, by this measure, they deserted their allies, yet they certainly preserved that republic, which must otherwise have been destroyed. As the pope durst not have taken this step but in concert with the king, so, to fix him absolutely to his party, he declared the French monarch had forfeited all title to the kingdom of Naples; and, upon the twenty-third of July, granted the investiture to Don Ferdinand, with the tribute reserved from king Charles of 8000 ounces of gold, to be paid annually into the apostolic chamber; but, on the seventh of August, this was changed into a present of a white horse decently equipped, which is all the tribute that has been paid ever since<sup>z</sup>. Count Pedro Navarro was this year routed before Tripoli, with the loss of several thousand men; and Don Garcia de Toledo, eldest son of the duke of Alva, through the rashness, or rather rapaciousness, of the count; and this year also Vianelli was killed; but the king, notwithstanding, persisted in his resolution of carrying on the war<sup>a</sup>.

THE catholic king went in the month of January to Seville, in order to hasten the vast military preparations that

<sup>u</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET.

Vid. del Card. Ximen.

<sup>y</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>w</sup> HERNANDO DE PULGAR,

<sup>x</sup> ZURITA, ANNAL. ARAGON.

<sup>z</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>a</sup> MAR. FERR.

mament,
obtains
many advantages without a blow.

he had caused to be made on the coasts throughout his whole dominions ; and declared publicly, that the war he intended was against the Moors, and that he meant to go himself into Africa. His subjects in general, and more especially the nobility and people of Castile, were very much alarmed at this project, and applied themselves to him in the most dutiful manner to divert him from that design. In France, however, they had other notions ; and Lewis the twelfth said publicly, “ I am the Moor and Saracen against “ whom they arm in Spain.” He acquired the reputation of a great politician by the event ; but this armament, notwithstanding, had all the effect which Don Ferdinand intended ; it brought the Moors to submission, obliged them to restore all the Christian slaves in their hands, to become his vassals, and to pay him large sums annually by way of tribute ; it had also a good effect in Italy, into which country, when the king condescended to lay aside his expedition into Africa, he sent many thousands of old troops, and at length declared his resolution to support pope Julius the second against all who should adhere to the council of Pisa, whom he treated as heretics. He entered into a league with king Henry VIII. of England against France ; and sent to admonish the king of Navarre not to have any thing to do with schismatics ; and to be very careful that the French did not make an irruption through his territories into those of Arragon. To which he received a civil return ; though it is scarce to be doubted that all the parties, even at this time, had taken their measures, and were determined how to act <sup>b</sup>.

Conquers
Navarre,
in consequence of a league beneficial
only to himself.

THE king of France had a great ambition, if not to be the master, yet at least to be the arbiter, of Italy. Maximilian, who saw no great advantages that could redound to him from the war, was willing enough to get out of it. As for the pope, he was so provoked with Lewis the twelfth for procuring and protecting the council of Pisa, that he first called in the Swiss to drive his subjects out of Italy, and took a resolution next of excommunicating that king. To bring so great a design to bear, he entered into a league with his catholic majesty and the Venetians, and the former laboured to bring the king of England to declare himself also for the league <sup>c</sup>. The army of the allies opened the campaign with the siege of Bologna, which they were obliged to raise. A battle ensued not long after, in which they were beat, but in which, notwithstanding, the Spanish infantry

<sup>b</sup> Lord HERBERT's History of Henry VIII.
NALD.

<sup>c</sup> RAI-

acquired great honour, and killed the French general Gaston de Foix, brother to queen Germana<sup>d</sup>. This success of the French increased the confused state of things in Italy, and was the true cause of a new revolution in that country before the close of the year; for the allies in general, knowing that it is the genius of the French to push their victories, used so much diligence, and acted with so much diffidence of each other, that, with the assistance of the Swiss, they carried their point almost every-where. In the mean time the catholic king, who had brought over the English monarch Henry the eighth, with a great army, into France, and procured potent succours from thence, under colour of recovering Guienne, judged it a fit opportunity to let his neighbours see what were his true designs, and who in reality were the Moors and Saracens he intended to humble<sup>e</sup>. John de Albret, who, in right of his wife, was at that time king of Navarre, was supposed to have an attachment to the crown of France. Upon this foundation the duke of Alva was sent with a small army of choice troops, to demand a passage through that kingdom into France; and that the prince of Vianna, and three of the best fortresses in the kingdom, should be put into his hands by way of security, that the king did nothing against the interests of Ferdinand. These terms being rejected, Pampeluna was besieged and taken, and the better part of the kingdom reduced. The French made some efforts to recover it, but without success; and, after they were repulsed, the duke of Alva completed his conquest<sup>f</sup>. Thus while other great powers were wasting their blood and treasure about they knew not well what, and wearied each other into peace with little or no advantage, Don Ferdinand acquired, or, as many authors say, - usurped, a kingdom that lay very convenient for him, and so became a greater gainer by the war than any, or indeed than all the other powers together. At this juncture the catholic king was in the zenith of his glory; and though, without question, he was one of the most potent princes in Europe, yet his superior reach in politics made him more respected than the terror of his arms; so that the penetrating his mysterious measures was the constant aim of the ablest statesmen in most of the courts of Europe<sup>g</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> GUICCARDINI.
Henry VIII.
RIANA.

<sup>e</sup> Lord HERBERT's History of
<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

<sup>g</sup> MA-

Falls into a low and jaundice, languishing condition, with little hopes of recovery.

THE French monarch, by the advice of cardinal Carvajal, demanded a truce of Ferdinand for a year in Spain, while the affairs of Italy were left to the chance of war. The catholic king gave so much countenance to this, as brought a French ambassador to his court; which so much alarmed his allies, that they were very silent on several topics upon which they had been troublesomely solicitous before. The king's subjects also reaped all the benefits of the truce during the continuance of the treaty; and the king was at liberty to act as he thought proper, if he had seen a favourable occasion; but, except repulsing John Albret, king of Navarre, who endeavoured to recover his kingdom, and an expedition or two of no great importance against the Moors in Africa, there passed nothing remarkable this year, at least on this side; for as to the war in Italy, it belongs to another place<sup>b</sup>. As to civil concerns, the king proceeded in deciding, or rather compromising, disputes among the nobility; and acted with some rigour against Don Pedro Gironne, who seized the best part of the duchy of Medina Sidonia, under pretence that he was heir to the duke, as having married his sister of the whole blood, notwithstanding he left a brother Don Alonso, to whom the king decreed it<sup>i</sup>. A little before Easter the king went from Valladolid to Medina del Campo, and from thence to Carrioncillo, an exceeding pleasant place, where a French cook belonging to queen Germana made him a strengthening soup, which he flattered him (for what monarch is there so wise as not to be flattered?) would enable him to beget an heir to his hereditary dominions, of which he was very desirous. But it had a quite different effect; for, upon retiring, as his custom was, into a convent, during Passion-Week, he fell into a languishing condition, and was thenceforward afflicted with a deep melancholy, so that he took no other diversion than hunting, which afforded him an opportunity of riding by himself in forests and deep vallies, which served only to nourish that humour, which, while it preyed upon his spirits, reduced his body to a skeleton, and wasted him with a slow disease, from which he could obtain no relief by physic<sup>k</sup>. This revived the hopes of those who, though they had been long forced to dissemble it, were enemies to his person and government, and excited a spirit of intrigue in others, who laboured to recommend his grandson Don Ferdinand, to the prejudice of the archduke Charles; which created such a prospect of future troubles, as gave all, who had a just concern for the public welfare and tranquillity, infinite anxiety and terror.

<sup>b</sup> PET. MART. Angl. Epist.

<sup>i</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>k</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

His declining state of health did not hinder Don Ferdinand from attending to affairs of state; neither did it impair, at least in any discernible degree, his faculties for business. The death of the queen of France gave occasion to his consent to send the bishop of Tripoli with compliments of condolance to her uncle, as well as to put him in mind of her right to the inheritance of her brother the duke of Nemours. The king charged this prelate with a commission of much greater importance, which was, to get the truce lately renewed for another year converted into a solid peace; to facilitate which, he offered that the infant Don Ferdinand should espouse the second daughter of the most Christian king, and proposed a marriage between that king and the infanta Donna Leonora his daughter<sup>1</sup>. This, however, came to nothing; for Henry the eighth of England, being equally offended at his renewing the truce with France, and at the delay of the archduke Charles's marriage with his sister the princess Mary, resolved to make both him and the emperor sensible of his displeasure, by concluding a peace with the French, and giving his sister to their king; both which measures were quickly carried into execution, notwithstanding all the pains his catholic majesty's daughter, queen Katherine, could take to prevent them<sup>m</sup>. The war continued hot in Italy, where the king could not depend so much on pope Leo the tenth as he had done on his predecessor. However, he laboured, and with success, to free the Genoese entirely from the French yoke; but his endeavours to procure a peace among the Italians were ineffectual, notwithstanding Selim, emperor of the Turks, threatened Italy with an invasion; which gave Ferdinand, who never let such opportunities slip, a pretext for arming by land and sea, in Catalonia, Sicily, and Sardinia, as well as in Castile, under colour of providing for the defence of Christendom against the infidels, but with an intention, as it was generally believed, to make use of them where-ever his interest might require. This armament, however, had a great effect; it awed the Turks, kept all his neighbours in suspense, preserved his conquests in Africa, and procured fresh submissions, and presents to a very great value, from the Moorish princes in that country<sup>n</sup>.

On the accession of Francis the first to the French throne, the catholic king began to apprehend that he would go in

1514

<sup>1</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. History of Henry VIII.

<sup>m</sup> Lord HERBERT'S
<sup>n</sup> HERRERA.

with the behaviour
of the states of Arragon.

person into Italy; and upon his sending an ambassador, with high professions of esteem and friendship, and strong assurances that he would observe the peace concluded by his predecessor, the king answered, that he would observe it punctually, provided it was extended to Italy°. He knew that this was not what the French king intended, and consequently the war would break out afresh; he summoned the states of Castile, Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, in order to raise money for the execution of his great designs. In the assembly of the states of Castile at Burgos, he carried his point to the full extent of his wishes, by annexing Navarre to the kingdoms of Castile and Leon for ever<sup>P</sup>. He had not, however, the like success in his hereditary dominions; the queen, whom he sent to hold in his name the states of Arragon, meeting with a very warm and obstinate opposition<sup>q</sup>. On the twenty-seventh of July, while he was at Burgos, he was taken with such a violent fit of vomiting in the night, that he was very near dying without assistance. This induced him to make his will, his physicians assuring him that he had not long to live, by which he left the regency of Spain, and the grand mastership of all the orders, to the infant Don Ferdinand. He recovered, however, and gave audience to the deputies from the states of Arragon, who came to offer him whatever supplies he judged requisite, provided he would repeal the law which gave vassals a right to sue for redress in the king's courts. To this Don Ferdinand answered roundly, that he would not purchase a supply at the expence of the liberties of his subjects: that, before his reign, the vassals of the nobility were their slaves: that he had made them free, and would keep them so; and, having said this, he ordered them to quit his presence<sup>r</sup>. He sent for cardinal Ximenes to preside in the royal council of Segovia, and then went in person to the states of Arragon<sup>s</sup>. He found them in a very ill temper; and though he had the clergy and the deputies from cities on his side, yet the greater and lesser nobility persisted firmly in their first opinions; which threw the king into such a rage, that he reproached them bitterly with want of duty to their sovereign, and of affection for their fellow subjects<sup>t</sup>. He then ordered his son, the archbishop of Saragossa, to go to that city (for the states were held at Calatayud), and to demand in his name a free gift from the inhabitants, which they

° MEZERAY.

<sup>P</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>q</sup> ZURITA,

Anpal. Arragon.

<sup>r</sup> ABARCA.

<sup>s</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULG.

Vid. del. Card. Ximen.

very chearfully and readily granted, and most of the great towns followed their example, to the no small regret of the nobility. He next undertook to restore a perfect understanding with the court of London, to which he sent his agent Gilibert, with very rich presents for the king, and with as valuable, though perhaps not quite so magnificent, to cardinal Wolfey, by which that monarch was induced to renew his treaties. The cardinal acquainted him with all the intrigues of the archduke, who was just declared of age in Flanders, and of his design to send the dean of Louvain with a formal compliment to his majesty, but with secret instructions to pry into every thing, and to send him an exact account of his measures; which piece of secret intelligence Don Ferdinand received with secret satisfaction <sup>u</sup>.

THIS year the Turks had a considerable fleet at sea, or rather a Moorish fleet in their service, under the command of the famous pirate Barbarossa. The places, however, that were held by the catholic king upon the coast of Barbary, were so well fortified and provided, that they were not able to give them much disturbance, except besieging Bugia, which they would certainly have taken, if it had not been relieved by a fleet from Majorca, which the viceroy fitted out without waiting for the king's orders <sup>w</sup>. The king Don Ferdinand removed from Valladolid, with an intent to pass the winter in Andalusia, in hopes that air and exercise would do him good, and, in his way thither, stopped at Placencia. There he received the dean of Louvain, who came from the archduke; and, treating him with great civility and kindness, drew from him many things. He engaged him to use his interest with his master, that Chievres, his first minister, might have nothing to do with Spain; and, when he had made what use of him he could, he ordered him to go to Guadalupe, there to wait his return <sup>x</sup>. The war in Italy this year was very warm, Francis the first being there in person, who gained a great victory over the Swiss in the neighbourhood of Milan, and soon after became master of that city. In the progress of the war, he derived great advantages from the military skill of count Pedro of Navarro, whose ransom he paid, and whom he engaged in his service, by affording him various instances of his generosity <sup>y</sup>. Towards the close of the year died Don Ferdinand Goncales de Cordova, surnamed the Great Captain, who had rendered such eminent services to the catholic king, and whose intrigues with the emperor, the king of France, the archduke, and other potentates, had given him inexpressible inquietude to the very last, so that he considered his death rather with satisfaction than regret<sup>a</sup>.

The death of Don Ferdinand Goncales de Cordova, surnamed the Great Captain.

1515

<sup>u</sup> LORD HERBERT'S History of Henry VIII. <sup>w</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY. <sup>x</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon. <sup>y</sup> HERRERA.

*Demise and character of the catholic king
Don Ferdinand of Arragon.*

THE king having advanced in his journey as far as Truxillo, and having ordered his son the infant Don Ferdinand, with his governor Don Pedro de Guzman, to Guadalupe, he set out for the same place, and, hunting by the way, came to the village of Madrigalejo, so poor and inconsiderable, that, finding himself extremely ill, he was obliged to take up his lodgings at an inn, as it was the only tolerable house in the place. He called immediately for his confessor father Matienco, and received the sacraments of the church. He then sent for the counsellors Zapata and Carvajal, of whom he demanded what they thought of his disposition of the regency of Castile in favour of the infant Don Ferdinand. They told him honestly, that it would prove very prejudicial to Spain, as it was impossible that he should discharge that trust himself; and therefore, as it must pass into other hands, his majesty was the best judge to whom it ought to be confided. The king then declared, by his last will and testament, the queen Donna Joanna his daughter the sole heiress of all his dominions; and, after her, his grandson Don Carlos. He left the queen Germana a pension of thirty thousand florins per annum, and the infant Don Ferdinand a revenue of fifty thousand ducats, charged on the revenue of the kingdom of Naples<sup>b</sup>. He declared Cardinal Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, regent of Castile<sup>c</sup>, and his natural son, the archbishop of Saragossa regent of Arragon, and also of the several kingdoms dependant upon that crown<sup>d</sup>. He signed his will on the twenty-second of January<sup>e</sup>, the queen arriving from Lerida the same day; and the next morning, Mariana says between twelve and one, Zurita between one and two, Ferreras between two and three, he expired, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and in the forty-second year of his reign over Castile, and in the thirty-seventh over Arragon, that is, at the very entrance of the year, his father dying on the nineteenth, as he did on the twenty-third, of January. Besides his legitimate children by his two queens, who have been already mentioned, he had by Donna Aldonca Iborra, before his marriage with

<sup>a</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.

<sup>b</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.

<sup>c</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULG. Vid. del Card. Ximen.

<sup>d</sup> BERNALDEZ.

<sup>e</sup> ZURITA, ubi supra.

queen Isabella, Don Alonso of Arragon, archbishop of Arragon and Valentia, and Donna Joanna of Arragon, whom he married to Don Bernard de Velasco, constable of Castile; and by two other women, one a native of Biscay, and the other of Portugal, he had two daughters, who were nuns<sup>c</sup>. Besides his hereditary kingdoms, which he bequeathed to the heirs of Castile, he added, by conquest, those of Granada, Naples, and Navarre. He directed his body to be interred in the capital of the first-mentioned, near that of Donna Isabella<sup>f</sup>. In its passage thither, under the care of the marquis of Denia, master of his household, it was received with great marks of respect by the nobility, but with much warmer tokens of affection from the people, who lamented their loss with great sincerity, and called him with great justice their father and their deliverer<sup>g</sup>. His panegyrist<sup>s</sup> would have us believe him a perfect prince<sup>h</sup>; his enemies allege, that he was not heroically brave, and by no means a slave to his word<sup>i</sup>. He had his virtues, he had his imperfections; but, take him all together, he was, properly speaking, the founder of the Spanish monarchy, and one of the greatest and wisest princes that ever sat upon a throne.

<sup>c</sup> EST. DE GARIBAY.<sup>f</sup> ZURITA, Annal. Arragon.<sup>g</sup> MARIANA.<sup>h</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>i</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA, &amp;c.

S E C T. XIV.

The Reign of Charles I. King of Spain, commonly stiled (by his superior Title) the Emperor Charles V. from his Assuming, to his Abdication; of the regal Titles.

THE royal council, of which the archbishop of Granada was president, gave immediate notice to the cardinal archbishop of Toledo of his being declared regent, and then removed to Guadalupe, where the infant Don Ferdinand was with the dean of Louvain, who, upon the cardinal's arrival, disputed with him the regency, as having himself received full powers, in case of the king's death, from Don Carlos. To this the cardinal answered roundly, that the archduke had no power to vest that authority in any, since, by the will of queen Isabella, he was not called to the succession till of full age: he added, that, if he had any such power, he could not constitute the dean regent, because he was a foreigner, and, as such, excluded by the laws. Upon this,

Accession of the archduke Charles, who immediately assumes the regal title.

the dean offered to act subservient to the cardinal, which he readily accepted, and the council removed to Madrid<sup>a</sup>. Things were carried somewhat higher in the kingdom of Arragon, where the chief justice refused to acknowledge the archbishop of Saragossa in quality of regent<sup>b</sup>. As soon as Charles received the news of his grandfather's death at Brussels, he dispatched a commission, confirming Ximenes in the regency, and at the same time acquainted him with the reasons that had induced him to assume the title of king, which were, that pope Leo and the emperor Maximilian, in their letters, had given him that title, which therefore he desired might be confirmed in Spain<sup>c</sup>. The cardinal, for this purpose, called an assembly of the principal nobility of Castile, where the point was warmly debated; and in which it is highly probable the nobles would have put a negative upon the king's request, if the cardinal had not suddenly cut the thing short, by saying, the king did not stand in need of their authority to confirm his title, but had asked their assent from a spirit of decency and complaisance; at the same time he ordered the officers to display the royal standard for Don Carlos the first<sup>d</sup>. This proclamation was made on the thirteenth of April, and, while he was proclaiming, the council unanimously confirmed the measure. They saw opposition was in vain, and concurred with a good grace in what they could not help. Some of the most considerable would have had recourse to their old method of a confederacy; and applied themselves, with this design, to the duke of Infantado, who assured them, that he thought himself as ill used as any by the cardinal, but advised them first to send a deputation, to demand of him a sight of the powers in virtue of which he acted. The cardinal received the deputation very obligingly, and promised him satisfaction the next day; and, when they came again for that purpose, shewed them a corps of two thousand old troops, and a train of artillery, that were drawn out before his palace, adding, "These are the powers by which I mean to govern Spain till the king shall arrive<sup>e</sup>." This was so much the cardinal's opinion, and he had so little notion of authority being respected without force, that, observing the government of king Ferdinand had thrown a great weight of property into the hands of the citizens and commons throughout Spain, he granted commissions of array, that, whenever it should be necessary, they might be in a condition to defend themselves; and, by this stroke of policy, created a standing army of thirty thousand men in a short time, well-disciplined, who were content to serve, without putting the crown to the expence either of pay or quarters<sup>f</sup>. John de Albret, the dethroned king of Navarre, with a considerable army which he had raised in France, endeavoured the recovery of his dominions, in which he was prevented by the vigour and vigilance of cardinal Ximenes, who sent a small body of old troops, under the command of Don Ferdinand Villalva, an old officer, to secure the passes into that country, by whom the king's forces were defeated, and the marshal of Navarre taken prisoner; which so afflicted the king and queen, that neither of them survived long after<sup>g</sup>. The cardinal then ordered all the numerous fortresses in Navarre to be demolished, leaving the fortifications only of Pampeluna; which raised a great clamour, as the title to that kingdom was none of the clearest; but the cardinal thought Don Ferdinand was to answer for the acquisition; and that, in quality of regent, it was his business to keep it<sup>h</sup>. In Naples, queen Joanna and her son Don Carlos were proclaimed with little opposition; but, in Sicily, the people revolted, not against the king, but the viceroy<sup>i</sup>. The corsair Barbarossa beat the Spaniards before Algiers, and made himself master of that place, and strangled the Moorish prince who had called him to his assistance<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, Vid. del Card. Ximen. <sup>b</sup> BARTHOLO. LEONARDO DE ARGENSOLA, Primera Parte de los Anales de Arragon. <sup>c</sup> ALNAR. GOMEZ, de reb. gest. Ximen.

<sup>d</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA, Vita del Imperator Carlo V. <sup>e</sup> SANDOVAL.

1516.

THE Flemish ministers who were about king Charles, perceiving how great a capacity the cardinal had, with what superior abilities he governed the dominions of Castile, while the archbishop of Saragossa, though the son of king Ferdinand, and a native of Arragon, could not persuade the states to proclaim their master king, or to acknowledge him for regent, advised him to send the cardinal orders to regulate the debts of the crown, to resume what had been unjustly usurped from its domains, and to call those to an account who had been intrusted with the revenue; that these necessary but difficult parts of government might be regulated before his majesty's arrival, and the blame of any severity that might appear in it be rather charged on that minister

Cardinal
Ximenes
governs Castile
with the title of regent, and boundless authority.

<sup>f</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR, Epitome de la Vida y Hechos del Emperador Carlos V. por D. Juan Anto. de Vera y Figueroa a Conde de la Roca.

<sup>g</sup> P. MORET.

<sup>h</sup> ALVAR.

GOMEZ. de reb. gest. Ximen.

<sup>i</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA.

<sup>k</sup> PET. MART. Angl. Epist.

1517.

than on themselves. The cardinal, on receiving the king's orders, demanded letters patent in full form, and with an augmentation of power, and on that condition undertook to execute what was enjoined<sup>1</sup>. At first this created some uneasiness at Brussels; but at length they advised the king to gratify the cardinal, and to intrust him with the power of bestowing governments, places of judicature, and offices of the revenue; but at the same time they increased the number of his colleagues, which gave him the less uneasiness, as he suffered none to share in his authority. The cardinal went through this difficult work with great dexterity, recovered several considerable lordships to the crown, but without requiring any account of the profits; and, as often as there was any pretence for doing it, gave those from whom they were taken money, or some other equivalent. Such as had been guilty of fraud or oppression in collecting or managing the public revenue, he punished severely, and, out of their fines and confiscations, discharged the debts of the crown. The great governments he bestowed upon the principal nobility; the less upon such as had raised themselves by their merit; in which he had a particular regard to old officers who had served long in the army, and, above all things, he was circumspect in the choice of those whom he raised to judicial offices. By this method he so qualified the rigour of his administration, and made his disinterested zeal for the public so apparent, that it began to rise above that envy which his grandeur had excited<sup>m</sup>.

*Disgraced
by Don Carlos, is poisoned,
and dies
without seeing the king.*

YET all he did was not equally pleasing to all men; for his removing the governor of Tordesillas, and a great part of the queen's household, was ill taken by many, though he did it because they soothed the queen in her melancholy; and those whom he placed near her did all they could to amuse and divert her, and even to awake her ambition; which they did so far, as to engage her to dress in a manner suitable to her quality, and even to go out of the castle to hear mass, when people were placed in the street to cry, Long live the queen! and to give other testimonies of joy, with which she was extremely pleased; and this the king approved so much, that he writ him a letter of thanks for it with his own hand<sup>n</sup>. He prevented likewise the Jews from obtaining an exemption from the penal laws, for which they offered a large sum of money; and, upon the pope's demanding a great sum of money from the clergy, under colour of a war with the

<sup>1</sup> SANDOVAL.    <sup>m</sup> HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.    <sup>n</sup> ALVAR.
GOMEZ, de reb. gest. Ximen.

Turks, he prevented that likewise, being persuaded, that, if such a precedent was once made, it would be frequently followed *. But there were some other mischiefs which he could not prevent, such as the quarrels amongst the nobility, the tumults in Valladolid, and other great cities, and the great sums of money that were sent out of the kingdom to purchase the favour of the Flemish ministers †. In the month of August the king landed at St. Andero, and immediately sent a courier to acquaint the cardinal and council with his arrival, who thereupon set out from Madrid to meet him, and to execute some orders he had before received by an express dispatched from the king when he embarked ‡. On the road, he was poisoned in a trout upon which he dined, though the effects did not presently discover themselves †. When he arrived at Aranda, where he found the infant Don Ferdinand, he suddenly posted guards about his palace, shut the city gates, and then signified to Don Pedro de Guzman his governor, and the bishop of Astorga his preceptor, the king's orders to withdraw, which afflicted the infant extremely ‡. Advancing as far as Roja, to meet the king, his distemper began to shew itself with such violence, that he found he had not long to live; and therefore, laying aside all concern for worldly affairs, he applied his thoughts to the means of making such an end as might be suitable to his life, and so expired on the eighth of November † (G).

Some

* HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.

† ALPHONSO ULLOA.

‡ PET. MART. Angl. Epist.

‡ MAYERNE TURQUET.

‡ ALV. GOMEZ, de reb. gest. Ximen.

‡ GOMEZ.

(G) The reputation of cardinal Ximenes is so great, and we find him so frequently mentioned in other histories, as well as of Spain, that we shall probably do the reader a pleasure in taking notice of a few particulars relating chiefly to his private life. The greatest part of the Spanish writers agree, that though his father was in low circumstances, yet the family of Cisneros was of antient nobility (1): if so, the cardinal took care not to discredit them by the addition of any modern titles, of which he bestowed some upon men of merit, but left his relations nearly in the same state in which he found them. In all probability this proceeded from a settled persuasion that it was best for them. In the midst of his greatness, he went one summer to the village where he was born, visited his kindred, and entertained them with all the marks of kindness

(1) Ferreras, Alvar. Gomez, de rebus gestis Ximen. lib. i. Eugenio de Robles, Vida del Ximenes.

Some say his death was hastened by his disgrace ; the bishop of Badajos, who had many obligations to him, and whom he and affection possible. Amongst the rest, there was an old man who lived very decently upon a narrow income, and took great pains in breeding up his children. He was baking his bread in little cakes when the cardinal came, on which he ran upstairs to change his cloaths ; but he made him come down immediately : “ Your dress, and “ your business, said he, very “ well become your station ;

“ take care that your bread
“ don’t burn, we can discourse
“ together while you are turning it.” He inquired afterwards into the number and circumstances of his family, and, when he took his leave, gave him wherewithal to provide for them (2). His humility was very unaffected, and broke out sometimes very unexpectedly ; he was present once when doctor Nicholas de Paz was explaining the philosophy of Raymund Lully ; and, in speaking to the question, whether that famous man had the philosophers stone, or not, he took notice of a passage in the Psalms, which has been thought to look that way :
“ He raiseth up the poor out “ of the dust, and lifteth the “ needy out of the dunghill, “ that he may set him with
“ the princes, even with the “ princes of his people.” That portion of Scripture, said the cardinal, may be much more naturally interpreted ; for instance, in my own case ; and then ran out into a long detail of his own meanness, and the wonderful manner in which he had been exalted, and this in so pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from all who were present. Those who lived in and near his time believed that he had the gift of prophecy, which arose chiefly from the two brothers, Charles and Ferdinand, saying frequently, on the great events of their life, “ This was foretold me by cardinal Cisneros.” It is very certain, that he advised Charles to send his brother out of Spain, and to divide his dominions with him. “ This, said he,

“ will constitute two great “ houses, and in your turns
“ you may be both emperors ;” which, as he took his advice, actually came to pass (3). But what came nearer to this point was, the agreement he framed between Ferdinand the Catholic and his son-in-law Philip. He took the oaths of each of them, and, at the time he took them, he said, “ Remember what I “ tell you, if you break this “ oath, you will not long survive it ;” which was actually the case with respect to Philip, who broke it, and died soon after (4). He had a great contempt for what were stiled the arts of a court, and would never use them. Don Pedro Porto Carrero, who was with king Charles in Flanders, wrote to him, that he had many enemies there, and advised him to make use of a cypher. He thanked him for his intelligence and his friendship, but rejected the ex-

(2) Puiggar, Vida del Card. Ximen.
Francisco de Cisneros, por el P. Pedro de Quintanilla.
Mayerne Turquet, Ferreras.

(3) Vida y prodigios del Card.

(4) Mariana,

he intended to have made his coadjutor, having, to please the king's minister Chievres, induced that prince to write him

pedient. "I have nothing," said he, that I desire to conceal; and, if I write any thing that is amiss, I will not deprive my enemies of their evidence." He behaved sternly himself to the nobility, but he advised both Ferdinand and Charles not to treat them with rigour. "Ambition," said he, "is their common crime, and you will do well to make submission their only punishment (5)." His coadjutor Adrian was miserably disturbed at the libels that flew about; but Ximenes, who was as little spared, bore them with great temper. "We act," said he, "and we must give others leave to speak; if what they say is false, we may laugh; if true, we ought to mend." However, he sometimes searched the printers and booksellers; but, as he gave previous notice, it may be presumed he did not often meet with things that could give offence (6). The great object of his care was the revenue of his archbishoprick; with which, however great, he did such things as could scarce have been expected from it, more especially as one half of it was constantly distributed in alms, about which he was so circumspect, that no fraud could be committed. He was very plain in his habit and in his furniture; but he knew the value of fine things, and would sometimes admire them. He once looked upon a rich jewel, and asked its price; the merchant told him: "It is a very fine thing," said he, "and worth the money, but the army is just disbanded; there are many poor soldiers, and with the value of it I can send a couple of hundred of them home with each a piece of gold in his pocket." All his foundations, and other acts of generosity, were out of the other moiety. His university of Alcala was a most stupendous foundation, begun and finished in eight years; he endowed there forty-six professorships, and at his death left it a settled revenue of fourteen thousand ducats per annum. His regulations must have cost him at least as much thought as his buildings and endowments. He saw clearly that ignorance was the bane of religion, and the only thing that made the inquisition necessary; for, if men understood the Christian religion, there could be no need to fear either Judaism or Mohammedism. Cardinal Granvelle, when he came into Spain, and had attentively considered this foundation, delivered his opinion in these words: "Time delights in hiding the origin of things; though we know it not, this man must have been of royal race, or at least the soul of a prince lodged in his private bosom." His granaries were likewise so amazing, so well built, that they

(5) Hern. Pulgar.

(6) Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carol. V. lib. ii. sect. 40. Epist. Ximen. ad Carol. apud Alv. Gomez, de reb. gest. Ximen. lib. vii.

him a letter of dismissal, which others say he did not receive till in his last agony, so that he never knew its contents u. The king went with his sister Donna Leonora to Tordesillas, to pay his duty to his mother, and thither came the archbishop of Saragossa, to make a report of the affairs of Aragon; but Cbievres, being apprehensive that he might de-

■ HERNANDO DEL PULGAR.

are not yet in decay; so well contrived, that they are always full: those at Toledo hold twenty thousand measures of corn, those at Alcala ten thousand, those at Tordelaguna, where he was born, five thousand, those at Cisneros, where his family was settled, the same quantity. His hospitals and his nunneries, in conjunction with these granaries, have banished want from his diocese. It was supposed that he would have left the direction of all these to his own order, and it was intimated to him. "By no means, said the cardinal; out of the revenue of the see of Toledo have I done all this, God forbid I should deprive the prelates my successors of their right, or their reward for seeing them duly applied. He was, however, no flatterer of prelates; for, upon visiting his diocese, and finding in the church of the Franciscans at Toledo a marble tomb near the altar, for Don Troilo Carillo, the son of his predecessor, he ordered the inscription to be effaced, and the tomb to be removed. "It is better, said he, that the remains of this child of sin should lie in some obscure place, than this mark of a bishop's incontinency should stare here mankind in the face." He was very learned himself, and the great patron and protector of learning; he wrote several pieces of divinity, that were never printed, as also the life of king Wamba, and some notes upon the Scripture, which are yet preserved. He caused the works of Tostatus to be printed at a vast expence at Venice. The Complutensian edition of the holy Scriptures, which was the first polyglot ever printed, cost him a prodigious sum, besides the maintenance of all the learned persons employed in it, the manuscripts he purchased at immense rates, and the pains he took himself in revising and correcting. He was also at great charge in publishing the Mozarabic liturgy, for which he had so high a veneration, that he established a chapel with twelve canons for reviving this office; and, with regard to other foundations, we have no room to enumerate them. Upon the whole, we have great reason to believe that he spoke truth when he said upon his death-bed, that, to the best of his knowledge, he had not misapplied a single crown of his revenue. Philip the fourth was at great pains to have procured his canonization with the popes Innocent the tenth, and Alexander the seventh; but we have never been let into the reasons why they did not succeed.

mand the archbishoprick of Toledo, which he intended for his nephew, prevailed upon the king not to see him, and to refuse him an audience of the queen Donna Joanna for the same reason <sup>w</sup>. This was the first disgust given to the Spaniards by the king; and perhaps would never have happened if cardinal Ximenes had once seen him, and had given him the lessons he intended; to prevent which, those who dreaded their effects had recourse to that detestable expedient which has been before-mentioned. There were some commotions this year in Sicily, though the king had changed the viceroy, and the Moors also began to infest the coasts of Granada and Andalusia <sup>x</sup>.

IN the month of January the Cortes, or assembly of the This mon- states, met at Valladolid, in which it was proposed, that the king should promise to observe the laws made at Burgos arch finds <sup>se-</sup> great dif- <sup>ven</sup> years before, that no foreigners should be capable of difficulty in any dignity or employment either in church or state in Cas- <sup>obtaining</sup> tile, and that no money should be sent out of the kingdom; <sup>that title</sup> but the bishop of Badajoz having represented to them, that <sup>from the</sup> they ought not to suspect their monarch, and assured them <sup>states of</sup> he would grant all they desired, they took the usual oaths, <sup>Arragon.</sup> and granted him a free gift of six hundred thousand ducats, payable in three years; after which, he promised to observe the laws, and more especially those on which they most insisted <sup>y</sup>. The king caused his sister Donna Catalina to be privately taken from her mother; but, the queen refusing to eat or drink for two days, there was a necessity of sending her back <sup>z</sup>. After this, the king, having appointed a council of regency, went to hold the states of Arragon, and, in his passage, had an interview with his brother, whom he persuaded to go to Flanders, being jealous of his remaining in Spain, where he was infinitely beloved. About this time he named William de Croy, Chievres's nephew, to the archbishoprick of Toledo, which was highly disagreeable to the people of Castile <sup>a</sup>. He arrived at Saragossa in the beginning of May, where, though he confirmed all their privileges, yet they made a difficulty of owning him for their king while the queen his mother lived; but at last they were prevailed upon by the archbishop of Saragossa not only to proclaim, but also to grant him a free gift of two hundred thousand crowns <sup>b</sup>. His kind usage and respect so wrought on queen Germana, that she made a voluntary cession of her rights to

<sup>w</sup> ARGENSOLA.

<sup>x</sup> SANDOVAL.

<sup>y</sup> CARVAJAL.

<sup>z</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.

<sup>a</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>b</sup> PET. MART.

Angl. Hist.

some danger, and the court extremely alarmed. This provoked him exceedingly; but when he came to know the truth, he was appeased, and only a few of the seditious were punished <sup>n</sup>. At Compostella the states fell into such confusion, that, after banishing the deputies of Toledo, the king adjourned them to Corunna, where, partly by threats, partly by promises, he obtained a subsidy of two hundred millions of marvadies, notwithstanding the cities of Toledo, Salamanca, Toro, Murcia, Madrid, Cordova, and others, protested against it <sup>o</sup>. He then appointed cardinal Adrian regent of Castile and Leon, and the governors of other parts of his dominions; after which he embarked on the 21st of May, with a few Spanish lords and all his Flemish ministers, who carried away an immense sum of money, and in six days arrived in the port of Sandwich, where he was received by cardinal Wolsey, to whom he promised the bishoprick of Badajoz; but, instead of it, gave him a pension of two thousand five hundred ducats, and who was much more in his secrets than his master. However, king Henry met him, and conducted him to Canterbury, where he passed the Whitsun holidays, and where, if we may believe a certain historian <sup>p</sup>, he fell in love with the king's sister, the queen dowager of France; and, after remitting the disputes between him and the French monarch to the decision of king Henry, he embarked on the 30th of May for Flanders, and landed safely at Flushing <sup>q</sup>.

Upon the emperor's departure, Valentia also revolts, and the insurrection becomes general in Castile.

THE city of Toledo had revolted before his departure, and soon after most of the great cities in Castile followed its example; and those who entered into this league stiled themselves Los Comuneros, or the commons <sup>r</sup>. Don Juan Padilla, excited chiefly by his wife Donna Maria Pacheco, daughter to the count of Tendilla, was at the head of those malecontents, and quickly assembled a great army, in which they carried a black standard. On the 2d of September they seized Tordesillas, where Don Juan had an audience of the queen, and told her, that her son Don Carlos having quitted his dominions precipitately, and a civil war being likely to arise, they had brought her the forces of Toledo, Segovia, and Madrid, for her security. The queen said, if she had known her father was dead, she would have provided for the government of the kingdom, and the due administration of justice, and desired them to transfer their assembly thither, which they did, and displaced the marquis of Denia, who was governor of the castle, and several others of her attendants,

<sup>n</sup> SANDOVAL.
<sup>q</sup> UALOA.

<sup>o</sup> FERRERAS.
<sup>r</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>p</sup> POLYDOR VIRGIL.

with whom the queen was displeased *. The president and royal council dispersed, and fled in disguise, and the cardinal regent retired with some difficulty from Valladolid. In the mean time dispatches arrived from Flanders, by which the constable and admiral of Castile were associated with the cardinal in the regency, who, in the month of November, established the council at Burgos, notwithstanding the assembly of the commons at Tordesillas forbid them to assume the government †. The regents raised an army, and appointed the count de Haro to command it; and, on the other hand, Don Antonio de Acuna, bishop of Zamora, who had joined the commons, engaged them to give the command of their forces to Don Pedro Gironne, which disgusted Don Juan Padillo, and their former chiefs; and it soon appeared that Don Pedro was not thoroughly in their interest, for he suffered the count de Haro to surprise Tordesillas, and, fearing their resentment, retired; upon which they appointed Don Juan Padilla to command their forces ‡. In the mean time, the Germanats committed as great disorders in Valentia; and the like disturbances would have infallibly happened in Arragon, if it had not been for the prudence of the archbishop of Saragossa §.

THE coronation and other proceedings of his imperial majesty in Germany, where, at this time, the dawning of the reformation gave him full employment, as they belong properly to another part of this work, shall not interrupt us here. We shall content ourselves with observing, that, pretty early in the spring, William de Croy, archbishop of Toledo, was killed by a fall from his horse; and that, a short time after his death, followed that of his uncle Chievres, who, tho' a minister of consummate abilities, yet was himself so avaricious, and had a wife who so much exceeded him in that vice, as not only to draw great odium upon themselves, but to create many inconveniences to the emperor x. The civil war in Castile was continued with great violence on both sides; that of the commons deriving great advantages from the intrigues of Donna Maria de Padilla, and no less from a long letter written by the cardinal regent to the emperor, which they intercepted, and published. In this letter he told him, that the commons did not act so much from a spirit of rebellion, as from a desire of being governed with justice and moderation, as in the days of his grandfather; and that it was not from a sense of loyalty that he was supported

The rebels
defeated,
and their chiefs beheaded.

* FERRERAS.      † VERA Y FIGUEROA.      § SANDOVAL.
‡ GASPAR ESCOLANO.      x FERRERAS.

by the nobles, but from a regard to the interest they had in breaking the power of the commons, and making themselves so much the more necessary to the crown ; that while he had corrupt and rapacious ministers about him, no effectual remedy could ever be applied ; and therefore, if he would act prudently, he should immediately remove all such from about his person, and restore the public tranquillity, by giving just satisfaction to his subjects<sup>7</sup>. The nobility, having thoroughly quieted the city of Burgos, strongly reinforced their army with old troops ; and having prevailed upon such of their brethren as had countenanced the commons, to withdraw from them, sent express orders to the count de Haro to fight. The army of the commons were also inclined to put all upon the issue of a battle ; but their general Don Juan de Padilla, a young man, and of no great experience, though personally brave, endeavoured to avoid it, being very sensible of the enemies superiority in all respects ; but not being general enough to manage that design with success, the count de Haro charged his army in its retreat, broke and routed it without difficulty, and made the three principal officers who commanded it prisoners<sup>2</sup>. The battle was fought on the 23d of April, near Villabar ; and as the victory was gained with courage, it was improved with conduct ; for the very next day, Don Juan de Padilla, Don Juan de Bravo, and Don Francisco Maldonado, were beheaded ; but Don Pedro Maldonado was spared, out of respect to the count de Benavente<sup>3</sup>. Upon this almost all the cities submitted, except Toledo, where the bishop of Zamora took upon him to be primate by the choice of the people, and Donna Maria de Padilla kept up their spirits with great address, and would have been truly worthy of the character of a heroine, if she had not also been guilty of some inexcusable acts of violence. The forces commanded by the bishop of Zamora being beaten in the field by the prior of St. John's, who commanded the army of the nobles, was at length forced to capitulate, except the alcazar, where Donna Maria, with her adherents, had intrenched, and defended themselves with great intrepidity<sup>4</sup>. The troubles of Castile, great as they were, fell short of those in Valentia, where the Germanats made open war upon the nobility, who at length were obliged to arm and defend themselves. Several sieges were made on both sides, several battles fought, but in the end, chiefly through their want of moderation and conduct, the Germa-

<sup>7</sup> SANDOVAL.      <sup>2</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA.

<sup>3</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>4</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.

islands were subdued <sup>c</sup>. The same humour also prevailed in Majorca, where the viceroy was forced to take shelter in the island of Ivica <sup>d</sup>. The French, during these disturbances, had twice attacked, and once conquered, the kingdom of Navarre; but, as all the strong places had been demolished by cardinal Ximenes, they were very speedily driven out again; yet they made themselves masters of Fontarabia in the bay of Biscay <sup>e</sup>. In Italy also the war was hot between the emperor and Francis I. the pope siding with the former, and the Venetians with the latter. By the emperor's intrigues with cardinal Wolsey, Henry VIII. concluded a treaty on the 24th of November, by which he engaged to assist the pope and the emperor, and promised the latter his daughter the princess Mary, whom he had before betrothed to the dauphin; but the views of this alliance were broken by the death of Leo the tenth, which happened on the second of December <sup>f</sup>.

THE cardinal bishop of Tortosa being chosen pope in the beginning of the year, after receiving the compliments of all the Spanish nobility, set out for Arragon, and afterwards embarked at Tarracena for Italy. Being seated on the pontifical throne, he retained his own name, and was stiled Adrian VI.; and, before his departure from Spain, had the pleasure of hearing that the alcazar of Toledo had been forced, upon which Donna Maria de Padilla had made her escape. She fled in disguise into Portugal, where it is said she lived but meanly upon a small pension granted her by the archbishop of Braga <sup>g</sup>. The emperor, resolving to return into Spain, appointed his brother Don Ferdinand vicar of the empire, and Donna Margaretta, his aunt, governess of Flanders. He then proceeded by land to Calais, and so passed to Dover <sup>h</sup>. He was received in England, where he landed about the end of May, with all possible marks of esteem and kindness. He was installed knight of the garter at Windfor <sup>i</sup>, and, which was the principal intent of his visit, he pacified Wolsey, who had taken some offence. He granted him a pension of 9000 gold crowns, and promised him an equivalent for his former pension, which pope Adrian had revoked: he renewed his promise of marriage to the princess Mary, and, having taken leave of the king, and of the queen, his aunt, passed over to Galais, and embarked on board his

The emperor, in his return to Spain, comes into England, and concludes a treaty with

Henry VIII.

<sup>c</sup> GASPAR ESCOLANO.      <sup>d</sup> VINCENT MUT.      <sup>e</sup> FERR.

<sup>f</sup> Lord HERBERT's History of Henry VIII.      <sup>g</sup> RAINALD.

<sup>h</sup> ULLOA.      <sup>i</sup> ASHMOLE's History of the most noble Order of the Garter.

fleet, consisting of 150 sail, on the sixth of July, and landed safely at Port St. Andero on the 16th of the same month <sup>k</sup>. The admiral and constable went thither to pay their respects, and to give an account of their regency. They were extremely well received, as were all the rest of the Spanish nobility, who had distinguished themselves during the troubles <sup>l</sup>. Four thousand Germans and two thousand Flemish foot, which he brought on board his fleet, were sent into Biscay, to serve against the French. He went from St. Andero to Valentia, and from thence to Valladolid. After he had reposed himself there a few days, he went to Tordesillas, to see his mother, and found her, notwithstanding the reports to the contrary, not at all wiser than when he left her <sup>m</sup>. On the 28th of October, a magnificent theatre was erected in the square of Valladolid, with a throne for his imperial majesty, and benches for the nobility, in whose presence the general pardon was read, which was as full as possible; but about fourscore persons, many of whom were ecclesiastics, were excepted by name; of whom Don Pedro Pimentel de Talavera was executed at Palentia, and ten or twelve more in other places. The council told him that few examples had been made; to which the emperor answered, there are enough. A person, who expected a reward, informed him where one of the most considerable persons lay hid, and, believing that he had forgot it, put him in mind of it again; upon which the emperor said, smiling, You had better let him know I am here, than tell me where he is <sup>n</sup>. The Germanats were entirely dissipated and subdued in Majorca, as well as Valentia; and the queen dowager of Portugal, Donna Leonora, the emperor's sister, returned into Spain <sup>o</sup>.

Holds an assembly of the states
at Palentia, and makes many good laws.

THE French, who had been long blocked up in Fontarabia, were relieved in the beginning of the year by a small army that entered Biscay for that purpose; and the emperor being apprehensive of an irruption into Catalonia, sent thither the prior of St. John, with the title of viceroy, and a considerable body of troops <sup>p</sup>. In the month of July he held an assembly of the states of Castile at Palentia, from whom he obtained a free gift of four hundred thousand ducats, and, in return, assented to several good laws; after which he went in person into the kingdom of Navarre, and sent the constable of Castile to the prince of Orange, to make an irruption

<sup>k</sup> Lord HERBERT's Hist. of Henry VIII.

<sup>l</sup> SANDOVAL.

<sup>m</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>n</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.

<sup>o</sup> GASPAR

ESCOLANO.

<sup>p</sup> SANDOVAL.

into France <sup>q</sup>. There happened this year a dreadful plague in the kingdom of Arragon <sup>r</sup>. Pope Adrian VI. dying on on the 24th of September, was succeeded in the papacy by Julius de Medicis, who assumed the name of Clement VII.; and this year count Pedro Navarro, who had been long prisoner in the castle of Simencas, having been taken in Italy fighting for the French, put an end to a long captivity, by stabbing himself with a knife <sup>s</sup>.

In the spring, Fontarabia was besieged and taken by the The Shab Spaniards <sup>t</sup>. The Shah of Persia sent an ambassador, or at least a person charged with his letter, to invite the emperor to an alliance against the Turks. The disputes that had arisen between the crowns of Castile and Portugal, with respect to the Moluccas, were terminated, or at least suspended, in consideration of a sum of money, and the marriage of the king Don Juan with the infanta Donna Catalina, the emperor's youngest sister, who still resided with the queen at Tordesillas <sup>u</sup>. In Italy, the imperialists obliged the French to repass the Alps; and soon after, the duke of Bourbon, who was then in the service of the emperor, made an irruption into Provence, and besieged Marseilles; which, however, he was obliged to abandon. Before the end of the year, Francis I. entered Italy with a powerful army, recovered Milan, and besieged Pavia <sup>w</sup>.

THE marquis de Pesquaira, who commanded the Spanish army in Italy, marching to the relief of that city, defeated the French army, and made the king Francis I. prisoner. The emperor, when he received this news, is said to have retired into his closet, to give God thanks before he divulged it <sup>x</sup>. This extraordinary success once more changed the face of affairs in that country. In Spain they were desirous of making the most of their royal prisoner, and the emperor held a council of state how it might be best done. His confessor the bishop of Osma advised him to set the king at liberty without ransom, which he thought would bind him more than any treaty; but the duke of Alba proposed that he should restore the duchy of Burgundy, and all that he had taken in Flanders; and that he should give the county of Provence in sovereignty to the duke of Bourbon. Adrian de Croy was sent to him into Italy, to propose to him these terms, with which that king was so much enraged, that, if it had not been for the Spanish lords who were about him, he would have dispatched himself with his dagger. At length 1523.

sends an embassador
to the emperor in Castile.

1524.

taken prisoner in the battle of Pavia.

<sup>q</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET.

<sup>r</sup> GASPAR ESCOL.

<sup>s</sup> FERR.

<sup>t</sup> SANDOVAL.

<sup>u</sup> GOES.

<sup>w</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>x</sup> ULLOA.

Q 3

growing

growing somewhat calm, he said he would perish in the vilest prison in Spain rather than dismember from his dominions the smallest province y.

Consents to go into Spain, to treat in person
with the emperor.

THERE were many of the Italian princes, who, upon this victory, began to be apprehensive of the emperor's power, and of that facility with which he might, at this juncture, make himself master of Italy. To prevent this, they secretly negotiated a league against him, and at the same time concerted with the utmost privacy how to procure the liberty of the French king. The first they in some measure brought to bear, but were absolutely disappointed in the latter; since, notwithstanding they offered immense advantages to Don Ferdinand de Alarcon, in whose custody the king was, he absolutely refused to betray the trust that was reposed in him <sup>a</sup>. Mr. Launoy, viceroy of Naples, took occasion from hence to suggest to the king, that the most secure and speedy way of obtaining his liberty would be to pass over into Spain, and negotiate it with the emperor himself. Francis was extremely pleased with this project, as believing that his eloquence might make some impression on the mind of his imperial majesty. With this view, the design being conducted with great secrecy, the king embarked for Naples, as it was given out, but in reality for Spain, and landed at Palamas in Catalonia, from whence he was conducted by Valentia to Madrid, and there lodged in the alcazar, or castle, under the care of Alarcon <sup>a</sup>. He found very soon that he had deceived himself; for, notwithstanding he was received every-where with great solemnity and magnificence, and treated by all the nobility admitted to his presence with great respect, yet he was very strictly confined; and, when he pressed for an audience of the emperor, was told he was not to expect it till the terms on which he was to obtain his liberty were adjusted <sup>b</sup>. The point chiefly insisted upon was the restitution of the duchy of Burgundy, which the king absolutely refused, but offered an equivalent; and, finding the treaty drawn into a great length, fell dangerously ill; of which the emperor, who diverted himself in making a tour to the principal places in Spain, being informed at Toledo, resolved to make him a visit, and set out immediately for the castle of Madrid <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA. <sup>b</sup> MARIANA. <sup>c</sup> Primera Parte de la Carolea Enchiridion, che Trata de la Vida y Hechos del Emperador Carlos V. hasta al ano 1585, por JUAN OCHOA DE LA SALDE, fol. 1585. <sup>b</sup> SANDOVAL. <sup>c</sup> OCHOA.

As soon as he came into the room, he uncovered, and embraced the king, who sat upon his bed; after which they were for some time silent. At length the king said, "You see your slave and prisoner." "I see," said the emperor, "a free prince, who is my dear brother and my true friend." Francis replied, "No, he is your slave." "Not so," added the emperor, "but my friend and my brother; your recovery is the thing in the world which I have most at heart: at present think of nothing but to regain your health; all the rest shall be settled afterwards just as you please." "No," said Francis, "but in the manner you prescribe." After an interview of half an hour, the emperor retired <sup>d</sup>. The next day he made him another visit in the evening, and, while he was with him, the king's sister, madame d'Alañon, arrived from France, whom the emperor himself introduced into his presence, and treated with all imaginable respect <sup>e</sup>. After this he returned to Toledo. The king grew worse after his departure, and was once in such an agony that his sister covered his face, believing him dead; he received also the sacraments of the church, but, by the care of the emperor's physicians, he at length recovered, tho' very slowly <sup>f</sup>. Madame d'Alañon, at the king's request, followed the emperor to Toledo, but returned without success; and she was not happy in a scheme which she projected for his escape, and which was discovered by his valet de chambre <sup>g</sup>. To push things to the utmost, the king sent the emperor word, that as he was determined never to part with the duchy of Burgundy, he had only to regulate the place and manner in which he should be confined during his life. The emperor answered, that would be soon done; but that he was sorry to find he was so unwilling to give, as a ransom, what in point of conscience he was bound to restore <sup>h</sup> (H).

IN

<sup>d</sup> FERRERAS.
<sup>e</sup> P. DANIEL.

<sup>f</sup> MEZERAY.
<sup>g</sup> GONZALO HERN. DE OVIEDO.

<sup>h</sup> SANDOVAL.

(H) There is a necessity, in order to make this part of our history understood, to say something here of the two countries of Burgundy, and of the titles by which Charles the fifth held the one, and claimed the other. These two countries, taken together, are of a very great extent, and, by their situation, fertility, and products, of an immense value. They lie on the east side of France, being bounded on the north by Champagne, Lorrain, and Alsace, on the west by the Nivernois and the Bourbonnois, on the south by Beaujolois, la Bresse, and the county of Geneva, and on the east by the country of the Swiss,

A new alliance, filed by the pope the Holy League, concerted against the emperor.

In the mean time the duke of Bourbon arrived in Spain, and went to wait upon the emperor at Toledo, who, when he heard of his approach, went out to meet him, tho' it rained, embraced him, and shewed such high testimonies of esteem, that madame d'Alañon resolved to return to France<sup>1</sup>. Francis, not long after, changed his mind, and offered to restore the duchy of Burgundy, provided the emperor would give him his sister the queen dowager of Portugal in marriage, and

<sup>1</sup> P. DANIEL.

Swiss, and part of Alsace (1). The duchy of Burgundy was united to the crown of France with great solemnity, and with an oath that it should never after be separated, by king John, Anno Domini 1361; but, notwithstanding this, he gave it to his fourth son Philip, September the 6th, 1363, to be held by faith and homage, and to revert to the crown upon failure of issue in lawful marriage (2). Charles the fifth of France confirmed this donation, adding only these words in the investiture, without lawful heirs descended in the right line. This Philip, surnamed the Hardy, was the father of John, who, by Margaret of Barvaria, became so of Philip the Good, who instituted the order of the Golden Fleece, and who, by Isabel daughter of John I. king of Portugal, had Charles the Bold, who was killed in the battle of Nancy, January 5th, 1477 (3). As for the county, it made part of the antient kingdom, which was called Upper Burgundy, and sometimes the principality beyond the Soane. Rainald, the first of that name, and the second count of Burgundy, was compelled to do homage for it to the emperor Henry III.; but Rainald III. being summoned, refused to do homage, and held it as a free sovereignty, from whence it derived the name of Franche Compté (4). This noble and fruitful territory was enjoyed, in right of his marriage with Margaret countess of Flanders, by Philip the Hardy, the founder of the last ducal family, which ended, as we have before observed, in Charles the Bold, who, by Isabel of Bourbon, left only one daughter Mary, who espoused Maximilian of Austria, by whom she had Philip, the father of Charles the fifth (5). Upon the death of her father, Lewis XI. then king of France, annexed the duchy of Burgundy to the crown, pretending that, by the general word heirs, heirs male were only intended; and this construction was allowed and confirmed by the states of the duchy (6). This, however,

(1) Cluv. Geog. Methode pour apprendre Geographie facilement, par M. Robbe, vol. i. p. 132. Geog. Mod. par du Bois, p. 129. (2) Abrege Chronol. de l'Hist. de France, par Mezeray, tom. iii. p. 62. P. Daniel.

(3) Nouvelle Abrege Chronol. de l'Hist. de France, par le P. Henault, p. 299. Mezeray, P. Daniel. (4) Hist. & Geog. Mod. par M. d'Audiffret, tom. ii. p. 430. Robbe, du Bois.

(5) Mezeray, P. Daniel, Amelot de la Houffaye. (6) Hist. & Geog. Mod. par M. d'Audiffret, tom. ii. p. 480. Mezeray, Dan. Henault.

and the duchy of Milan in dowry; adding, that he would give one of his sons and twelve of the first nobility in France as hostages for the performance of it. The emperor was a little embarrassed, having promised the queen, as he afterwards did the duchy, to the duke of Bourbon; but that princess disengaged him, by declaring she would marry the king, and not the duke <sup>k</sup>. The Italian states, before the end of the year, had brought their scheme to bear; the pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines, entering into an alliance, which, out of respect to the first of these potentates, was stiled the Holy League; to the support of which it was understood that both England and France would concur; for the emperor having disoblinded cardinal Wolfey, by no longer writing to him with his own hand, and subscribing, as he was wont

<sup>k</sup> MEZERAY.

was considered by Maximilian, who was afterwards emperor, as a flagrant act of injustice, because king John, who re-annexed it to the crown of France, and gave it afterwards to his son Robert, actually came to it by inheritance from his mother, and might be presumed to grant it upon the like terms to his son. However, as the reader will see in the text, France, whatever her title might be, still kept the duchy of Burgundy; though the county of Charalois, which was a fief of this duchy, was yielded by Lewis XI. to the archduke Philip, and from him descended to his son Charles the fifth, from whom it was taken under pretence of felony, but was again restored by the treaties of Chaateau, Cambrensis, and Vervins, afterwards seized again by the crown of France, and restored again to that of Spain, as the reader will see, by the treaty of the Pyrenees (7). It was then bestowed by Philip IV. as a compensation for his losses, upon the great Conde, and has remained ever since in his family, and gives at this day the title of a count to one of the princes his descendants (8). As to the Franche Compté, it belonged, without dispute, to Maximilian of Austria, in right of his marriage, and from him descended to Charles V. who annexed it, together with all the provinces of the Low Countries, to the empire, under the title of the Circle of Burgundy (9). Thus the reader sees the true source of that bitter animosity which reigned between these two great princes, and descended, together with their dominions, to their posterity, and proved the cause of so many wars, and so much disturbance, not only to their own dominions, but thro' all Christendom.

(7) Corps Diplom. de Droit des Gens, tom. vi. p. ii. p. 264.

(8) Nouvelle Descript. de la France, par M. Piganol de la Force, tom. iii. p. 213. Geog. Mod.

par du Bois,

(9) Clav. d'Audiffret, du Bris, &c.

to do, Your son and cousin, CHARLES, he had prevailed with his master Henry VIII. to change sides, and to promise his daughter Mary to the dauphin; which induced his imperial majesty to conclude his own marriage with the infanta Donna Isabella of Portugal, tho' they were both grandchildren to Ferdinand and Isabella<sup>1</sup>. This was afterwards, notwithstanding, thrust into the reasons of the war, and urged against the emperor as a notorious breach of faith.

The French
king at last finds it requisite to conclude the treaty of Madrid.

His confinement growing more and more uneasy, the French king, finding that his solicitations had little or no effect, resolved to indemnify himself, when at liberty, for the concessions he was obliged to make in order to obtain it. The conditions of this famous peace, which, from the place where it was made, is stiled the treaty of Madrid, were the restitution of the duchy of Burgundy, the renunciation of all rights pretended over the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the city of Genoa, and the town of Ast, the sovereignty claimed over certain states and towns in the Low Countries, the obliging Don Henry d'Albret to quit the title of king of Navarre, giving full satisfaction to Germana queen dowager of Arragon, and to the prince of Orange, restoring his estates and dignities to the duke of Bourbon, and the like favour to be reciprocally extended by the emperor, as well as the king, to all who had suffered in any degree by this quarrel<sup>m</sup>. On the 15th of January the peace was published, the king set at liberty, and his marriage with the queen dowager of Portugal celebrated by proxy, her dowry being settled by the treaty; as also that the dauphin should marry her daughter the infanta Donna Maria; and that the king should not only give the dauphin but his brother, and twelve young noblemen, for hostages; all which the emperor insisted that the king should promise upon his oath taken in the most solemn manner, which he did; but some say he made as solemn a protestation before he took it, that what he did was by absolute constraint; and that his true intention was to perform his promise no farther than it should be reasonable; of which the emperor had some information, or at least a strong suspicion; so that notwithstanding the king solemnly espoused Donna Leonora, yet he would not remit that princess into her husband's possession till the treaty was executed, but sent him soon after with all exterior marks of kindness into his own dominions<sup>n</sup>, while he went to celebrate his own marriage with the infanta

<sup>1</sup> Lord HERBERT's History of Henry VIII.

<sup>m</sup> SANDOVAL.

<sup>n</sup> OCHOA.

Donna Isabella of Portugal °. About this time the bishop of Zamora was executed in the castle of Simencas, where for some years he had been confined.

CHARLES DE LANOY and Don Ferdinand d'Alarcon attended king Francis to the frontiers, and received the hostages, whom as soon as they had delivered to the constable of Castile's son, they followed that prince, who very soon acquainted them that it was not in his power to restore Burgundy; but that he was willing to pay two millions of crowns for the ransom of his son and the rest of the hostages; and, on the 22d of May, he signed the Holy League at Paris.

When at liberty, declares he will execute it so far only as he thinks reasonable.

His ambassadors soon after signified as much to the emperor. The ministers of the rest of the allies demanded that he should cause the siege of the citadel of Milan to be raised, and put Francis Sforza into the possession of the city and duchy; that he should renounce the kingdom of Naples, should pay what was due to the king of England, and send no more troops into Italy; otherwise they would declare war against him, and compel him to perform what they demanded ¶. The emperor answered, that the French king did very ill not to keep his word as a monarch, and his oath as a Christian; that his parliaments could not dispense with either, since, before they were given, they approved both; that, with respect to the queen Donna Leonora, he ought to behave to her as his lawful wife; that the hostages were in his power, and he would do with them what he pleased; that the duke of Milan was his feudatory, and he meant to punish him as a rebel; that the Spanish troops in Lombardy acted by his orders, and should be recalled when he thought fit; that the kingdom of Naples was his inheritance; that he would come or go, or send into Italy, when he thought proper; and that he meant to pay the king of England out of the ransom due from the king of France; neither was he at all in doubt, that, with the assistance of God, he should defend his own rights, and protect his subjects, when attacked †. A severe edict was published this year against the Morescoes in the kingdom of Granada, and an insurrection made by them in the kingdom of Valentia was suppressed, and very rigorously punished. In Italy, the imperialists made themselves masters of Milan, and took possession of the city of Rome, which obliged pope Clement VII. to shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo, where, by dint of prayers and intreaties, he at last procured a truce for three months °.

1526.

° OCHOA.    † P. DANIEL.    ‡ MEZERAY.    § FERR.
! RAINALD.

THE

Rome
sacked by the impe-
rialists,
commanded by the duke of Bourbon
and the prince of Orange.

1527.

Strange messages between Francis I.
and the emperor
Charles
V.

THE emperor held in the spring an assembly of the states at Valladolid, where, for the sake of conveniency, his imperial majesty ordered the deputies of the respective orders to hold their assemblies in different places; whereas hitherto the nobility, clergy, and commons, had sat together. He explained to them the motive of his calling them together, which was his want of money; but each of the orders suggested separately a plausible excuse, and agreed unanimously to grant him nothing; upon which they were dissolved about the middle of March<sup>t</sup>. On the 21st of May the empress was delivered of the prince Don Philip at Valladolid<sup>u</sup>, and, for the solemnity of his baptism, most prodigious preparations were made; but, on a sudden, the emperor suspended all rejoicings, on account of what had happened at Rome, where the army of the duke of Bourbon had sacked the city, and the prince of Orange, who commanded the army after his decease, kept the pope blocked up in the castle of St. Angelo. For the safety and preservation of his holiness, the emperor caused public prayers to be made at Madrid, disavowing all that his generals did, tho' he reaped all the advantages from the steps they took, by which they became masters of all Italy, till general Lautrec entered it with a French army, tho' paid in a great measure by English money, by which the face of affairs was quickly changed, and the pope, being at liberty to speak his own language, declared for the allies<sup>w</sup>.

THE new year opened with a very new scene: two kings at arms, one stiled Guienne, from the French king, and the other Clarence, from Henry of England, demanded a public audience of the emperor; which being granted, they first recapitulated the wrongs done to their respective masters, and then the insults offered to the pope, and the cruel plundering of Rome for two months together; in resentment of which they declared war. The emperor ordered his answers to be delivered to them in writing on the 25th of January. In that to the French king, he advised him not to put any trust in the promises of Wolsey, whose boundless ambition and inordinate avarice put him upon sowing discord between them. He said that minister had threatened the emperor, for not using his interest to advance him to the papacy, that he would so embroil the affairs of Christendom, that they should not be effectually settled again for one hundred years to come. He also intimated, that he doubted whether his ambassador had repeated to him what he told him when he had an audience of him at Granada; of which Francis

<sup>t</sup> MARIANA.<sup>u</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>w</sup> RAINALD.
having

having demanded an explanation, the emperor said he told him, that he acted wickedly, and like a coward, in breaking his word, and forgetting his oath, which he would maintain to his face, with his sword in his hand *. The king of France thereupon sent Guienne with an answer, which was read at a public audience, importing, that if the emperor ever said the king of France behaved otherwise than became a good knight, he lied, and lied as often as he said so; and that he would make this good in single combat. The emperor, by his king at arms, accepted the challenge, and assigned an island in the river dividing their dominions; but all this came to nothing †. The French tell this story otherwise, and, in its proper place, we shall give their account of the matter. In Spain, the states of the several kingdoms swore to Don Philip as the heir apparent, and gave the emperor moderate supplies ‡. In Italy, the fortune of war varied. In the beginning of the year the allies were successful; Philippine Doria, then in their service, beat the imperialists at sea; and the French, about Midsummer, besieged the city of Naples; but, before the close of it, they were obliged to raise the siege, were beat in their retreat by the prince of Orange, and a great part of them, who had taken shelter in Averso, were obliged to capitulate there. The city of Genoa likewise revolted from the French, and declared for the imperialists, by the advice and with the assistance of the Dorias §, who were from thence regarded as deliverers of their country.

1528.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the emperor resolved to make a voyage to Italy, leaving his empress resident in Spain. As he was to embark at Barcelona, he summoned an assembly of the states of Catalonia for the first of May. When he arrived in the neighbourhood of that city, the inhabitants sent deputies to know whether he would make his public entry in quality of emperor, or of their count, because of the ceremonial; to which he prudently gave this answer, that he preferred the title of count of Barcelona, made his entry in that quality, and obtained a generous supply from the states †. While he was there, he concluded a treaty with the pope, by which he consented to give his natural daughter Margaret to Alexander Medicis, the pope's nephew, who was to have the state of Florence, with the title of duke; that the places taken from the holy see should be restored; that Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, should have

Treaty concluded between the emperor and pope Clement VII. at Barcelona.

* LORD HERBERT'S Hist. of Henry VIII. † P. DANIEL.
 ‡ MARIANA. § JUSTINIANI. † SANDOVAL.

justice done him ; and that, after pacifying Italy, he would go into Germany, and, with the assistance of his brother Ferdinand, who was become king of Hungary, endeavour to reduce the Lutherans. On the other hand, the pope consented to acknowledge him in quality of king of Naples ; that he should present to all archbishopricks and bishopricks ; and that his holiness should grant free passage to his troops whenever he required it. The emperor swore to the due performance of this peace on the 29th of June, in the cathedral of Barcelona <sup>c</sup>.

Peace of Cambray made by the French king's mother and
the emperor's aunt.

1529.

IN the mean time madame Louisa, mother to the French king, signified to madame Marguerite, the emperor's aunt, and governess of the Low Countries, that she would be glad to confer with her about a peace ; of which the emperor being informed, he sent full powers to his aunt. Madame Louisa having received the like from her son, set out for Cambray, where these two princesses, taking up their lodgings in houses that joined to each other, caused a door to be broke through the wall, that they might confer together when they pleased, without ceremony. The first conference was held on the 8th of July : the peace was signed, concluded, and the princesses swore to the execution thereof on the 5th of August following, in the cathedral church of Cambray ; and, three days after, it was sworn to by Francis himself <sup>d</sup>. By this treaty he undertook to pay by the first of March two millions of crowns of gold for his ransom, and to withdraw his troops out of Italy in six months. The king of England was likewise comprised in this treaty. On the 12th of August the emperor made his public entry into Naples, where he received, and swore to, the treaty of Cambray. He had afterwards an interview, and was twice crowned by the pope ; and, before the close of the year, he concluded a peace with the Venetians, and a treaty of commerce <sup>e</sup>. While his imperial majesty was at Bologna, Francis Sforza came thither, and threw himself at his feet, telling him, that he relied upon his clemency, and his own innocence ; after which he began to make many protestations of his fidelity ; but the emperor, perceiving that he was sick and weak, took him up, embraced him, and promised to restore him his dominions upon very moderate terms, at which all the world was surprised <sup>f</sup>. This year the younger Barbarossa, who had succeeded his brother at Algiers, defeated a squadron of the

<sup>c</sup> FERRERAS.
History of Henry VIII.

<sup>d</sup> P. DANIEL.
<sup>f</sup> OCHOA.

<sup>e</sup> Lord HERBERT'S

emperor's gallies on the coast of Spain, and took or sunk six out of eight, which gave the emperor great displeasure <sup>g</sup>.

THE spring was spent in Italy in carrying the peace, which <sup>The emper-</sup> was proclaimed in the cathedral of Bologna on new-year's <sup>ror grants</sup> day, into execution, in ceremonies requisite to establish the <sup>the city of</sup> emperor's authority, and in perfecting the concession of the <sup>Tripoli,</sup> islands of Malta and Gofa, together with Tripoli in Barbary, <sup>with</sup> with all their castles, fortresses, and other dependencies, to the <sup>Malta</sup> military order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, of <sup>and Gofa,</sup> which they were put in possession by Hector Pignatelli, vice- <sup>to the</sup> roy of Sicily, on the first of April following <sup>knights of</sup> <sup>St. John.</sup> <sup>h</sup>. After these things were dispatched, the emperor, pursuant to the promise he had made the pope, set out for Germany, and, in his passage; was splendidly entertained by the marquis of Mantua. The keys were presented to him in all the cities belonging to the Venetians, by an express order from the senate; and his brother Ferdinand, king of Hungary, met him at Inspruck in Tirol <sup>i</sup>; but the remainder of this journey, and the consequences of it, belong to the history of the empire, where they will be found. That insult which had been offered to his arms by the corsairs under the command of Barbarossa, affected him to such a degree, that he sent orders to Andrew Doria, esteemed one of the best seamen of that age, to revenge it at all events. Doria had a good squadron of his own, which he not only reinforced with all the Spanish gallies that were ready to put to sea, but demanded also, in the name of the emperor, assistance from Francis I. who sent him ten gallies, well-manned <sup>k</sup>. Arriving at Majorca, he was informed that Barbarossa had sixty gallies under his command, all excellently provided; that, with half of these, he was sailed to Algiers, and the other half, under the command of Haly, was at Sargel; to which port he sailed, forced his passage in, plundered the adjacent country, forced the enemy to take shelter in a fortress on shore, and brought away two gallies and seven smaller ones; but George Pallavicini, with three companies of Italians, being sent to recover the Christian captives, after having performed that service, fell to plundering, and thereby gave the Turks an opportunity of surrounding and cutting him and all his people to pieces <sup>l</sup>. The release of the dauphin and the duke of Orleans was postponed from the first of March to the first of 1530.

<sup>g</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>h</sup> P. DANIEL.<sup>i</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.<sup>k</sup> P. DANIEL.<sup>l</sup> Historia de muchas Guerres entre Christianos y Infideles desde el anno 1546, hasta el 1565, por PEDRO DE SALAZAR.

July,

July, the French king not being able to raise the money before, and then they were delivered by Don Alvaro de Lugos at Fontarabia, upon the receipt of a million two hundred thousand crowns, the other eight hundred thousand being assigned to the king of England<sup>m</sup>. At the same time queen Leonora was received by cardinal Tournon and marshal Montmorency<sup>n</sup>. On the 30th of November died the princess Margaret, who directed that her body should be interred at Granada, near those of their catholic majesties Ferdinand and Isabella, and was replaced in the government of the Low Countries by Donna Maria, queen dowager of Hungary<sup>o</sup>.

He takes precautions for securing his dominions
against the French
king.

WHILE the emperor was embarrassed in Germany, as well with disputes about religion as with a war against the Turks, the government in Spain found themselves not a little embarrassed with the pope, who sent several bulls thither of different natures, which they directed to be examined as to their compatibility with the laws, before they were carried into execution; upon which some of the inferior clergy began to preach in a very seditious strain, and to infuse into the minds of the people an apprehension that the church was in danger; which, considering the emperor's absence, might have been attended with great inconveniencies, but for the vigilance and activity, as well as the loyalty and steadiness, of cardinal Tavera archbishop of Toledo, president of the council of Castile, and the rest of the ministers<sup>p</sup>. The emperor received their remonstrances on this head very kindly, and promised to address himself on this subject to the pope. He directed also, that a collection should be made of the opinions given by the divines and lawyers in their catholic majesty's dominions at the time the marriage was under consideration between the infanta Donna Catalina and Henry prince of Wales, brother to prince Arthur, her former husband<sup>q</sup>. He farther ordered, that levies should be made for the war against the Turks; and that the frontiers towards France should be put into a proper state of defence, being still under some apprehension of Francis I. The pope, to make court to his imperial majesty, created, towards the close of the year, two Spanish cardinals, Don Alonso Manrique archbishop of Seville, and Don Garcia Loyaza archbishop of St. James of Compostella<sup>r</sup>. This was exceedingly acceptable to that nation.

1531.

<sup>m</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>n</sup> MEZERAY.

<sup>o</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>p</sup> RAI-

NALD.

<sup>q</sup> OCHOA.

<sup>r</sup> SANDOVAL.

THE emperor, who had spent the winter in the Low Countries, returned in the spring to Germany, in order to defend it against the Turks, their emperor Solyman the Magnificent being bent upon attacking Vienna with the whole force of his empire; but he is said to have abandoned that enterprize by the advice of the French and of the Venetians, who represented the fortune of Charles as invincible; and that, if he should be victorious over the Turks, he would give law to all the princes in Europe, and compel the Christian powers to attack the Ottoman empire on every side. In Spain, the empress held at Segovia the states of the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, in which assembly many good laws were made. Andrew Doria had orders to oppose the Turkish fleet, which consisted of ninety gallies and a prodigious number of small vessels, with which they threatened desolation to the coasts of Italy and Spain. Doria had a fleet of equal strength, with ten thousand Spanish, Italian, and German troops on board. Upon the first intelligence of which, the Turks retired into port, which left him at liberty to reduce Coron, and other fortresses in the Morea, after defeating in the field all the forces that could be brought to oppose them. Having left in the place first-mentioned a Spanish garrison, under the command of Don Jerom Mendoza, he returned to Genoa, to wait the arrival of the emperor. Charles, having settled every thing in Germany, returned into Italy with a numerous army; and, having adjusted also the affairs of that country with the pope at Bologna, he resolved to return into Spain, where the state of his affairs, and the natural affection of that people for their sovereign, caused him to be very impatiently expected; as well as some abuses in the government, which naturally spring up in the long absence of the prince.

IN his journey from Bologna to Genoa, the emperor visited the field of battle, where Francis I. was taken, attended by such of the principal generals that were present in that engagement as were yet alive, and heard with great attention all the circumstances they related concerning that glorious victory. On the 10th of March he arrived at Genoa, and lodged in the palace of Andrew Doria; after which he embarked on board the gallies commanded by that famous admiral, and arrived safely at Barcelona on the twenty-second of April, where he found the empress, the prince Don Phi-

1532.

Andrew Doria defeats the Turkish fleet, and takes Coron in the Morea.

* OCHOA, ALPHONSO ULLOA.
 ZAR, FERRERAS.

* PEDRO DE SALAZAR,
 SANDOVAL, VERA Y FIGUEROA,
 FERRERAS.

lip, and the infanta Donna Maria, with the whole court, who were come thither to meet him <sup>w</sup>. He found likewise an énvoy from Muley Houssein king of Tunis, to desire his assistance against the corsair Barbarossa, by whom he had been driven out of his dominions. The emperor heard him very graciously, and promised his master relief. In the month of July he went to Moncon, where he held the states of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, his secretary having explained to them the great things that the emperor had done for restoring the peace of Europe, and the defence of Christendom against the infidels, the kingdom of Arragon presented him with a free gift of two hundred thousand crowns, and Catalonia and Valentia gave in proportion. Don Alvaro Bazan, who was sent with a squadron of gallies to the coast of Barbary, performed great things there; took several places, and ruined a squadron of corsairs. The Turkish emperor Solyman sent a numerous army to besiege Coron by land, and a fleet with sixty gallies, and a considerable body of troops on board, to cover that siege; but the garrison making a brave defence, Andrew Doria sailed to its relief, and, having beat the Turkish fleet, changed the garrison, and supplied the place with all kinds of provision and ammunition, which so mortified Solyman, that he ordered the general who commanded his army to be strangled <sup>1</sup>. He then caused Coron to be blocked up a second time, when the garrison being reduced to distress, the new governor was prevailed upon, against his own opinion, to make a sally with the best part of the troops in the place; but he conducted it with such address, and the Spanish troops behaved with such intrepidity, that it answered the end for which it was made. In his retreat he was furiously attacked by the Turks, who continued the engagement after their general was slain, and pushed it so far, that Don Rodrigo Machicao was likewise killed; but his lieutenant Hermosilla, taking the command, repulsed the Turks with so much spirit, that they were at length glad to permit him and his troops to enter again into the place <sup>2</sup>.

But the too-great expence of this conquest in-

In the spring the emperor held an assembly of the states of Castile at Madrid, in which some beneficial laws were made, and he obtained a large supply for carrying on the war against the infidels <sup>3</sup>. He considered, however, that his new conquest of Coron could not be maintained but at a vast expence, and was of no real advantage to him, tho' duces the of great consequence to the pope and the Venetians, who emperor to were therefore very pressing in their solicitations for him to quit it. keep it. Upon mature consideration, he judged this inexpedient. Having, therefore, first offered it to his holiness, the Venetians, and to the grand master of Maltha, with an annual subsidy towards the maintenance of the garrison, and they having refused it, he sent orders to the viceroys of Naples and Sicily to send a fleet to bring away the garrison. This they did, together with the artillery and military stores, and all the Greek inhabitants and their effects: upon the arrival of this fleet in Sicily, lands were assigned to the Greeks for their subsistence, and their posterity continue in possession of them to this day<sup>a</sup>. Solyman the Magnificent, burning with a desire of revenge for the enterprize of Coron, sent for Barbarossa, and, to his own amazement, and to that of all the world, declared him a basha, and general of the Ottoman forces by sea: that these might not appear empty titles, he equipped a squadron of fourscore gallies, and ordered him, after repairing and fortifying Coron, to waste and destroy the coasts of Sicily and Italy; which he punctually performed, and, after having terrified Rome itself, and acquired a great booty, returned in triumph to Tunis<sup>b</sup>. This was extremely grating to the emperor, who was no sooner informed of this expedition than he sent instructions to Andrew Doria to hold his gallies in readiness, ordered the viceroys of Naples and Sicily to prepare theirs, demanded assistance from the pope, the king of Portugal, and other Christian princes, and settled the general rendezvous of the whole fleet for the month of May in the ensuing year. In the mean time he ordered Lewis Presendes, a Genoese by birth, and one of his own domestics, to go with two ships richly laden to Tunis, as a merchant, in order to examine the state of that place, and its fortifications, that he might take measures for his intended enterprize with greater certainty. On his arrival, however, Presendes was betrayed<sup>c</sup> by a Moresco servant; upon which Barbarossa caused his head to be cut off, and his body to be burnt without the city<sup>d</sup>. This year proved fatal to pope Clement the seventh, who was succeeded in the papal throne by cardinal Alexander Farnese, whom, some say, he nominated on his death-bed, and who, after his accession, assumed the name of Paul the third;

<sup>w</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, VERA Y FIGUEROA, FERRERAS.
<sup>1</sup> OCHOA. <sup>2</sup> SANDOVAL, ALPHONSO ULLOA. <sup>3</sup> MARIANA, FERRERAS.

1534

<sup>a</sup> SANDONAL, ALPHONSO ULLOA.
<sup>b</sup> SALAZAR, OCHOA.
 Adriani.

<sup>c</sup> PEDRO DE RAINALD, PAULI JOVIS Hist.

and this year also was established the famous order of jesuits<sup>d</sup>.

*His expedition into Africa,
and the reduction of the fortress of Gouletta.*

THE war of Africa so occupied the emperor's thoughts, that he seemed to have no other view than that of restoring the king of Tunis, and humbling the pride of the infidels. This coincided so exactly with the interests of his neighbours, that the succours he received very much surpassed his expectations. Don Lewis of Portugal brought a squadron of twenty-two ships of war, besides a large galleon, and two ships of a new construction, and of a size superior to any that had yet been seen. Andrew Doria's squadron of gallies were in every respect complete; and one of them, which was intended for the emperor's person, had four benches of rowers, and the men were all cloathed in silk. The emperor, having made a general review, embarked for Sardinia; where, notwithstanding he met with very bad weather in his passage, he arrived on the 11th of June, and there found the Italian forces; so that when he weighed for the coasts of Barbary he had one hundred and forty men of war and gallies, and two hundred and sixty vessels of smaller size. Barbarossa had fortified Tunis in the best manner he was able, and had assembled near one hundred thousand men for his defence. As he foresaw the Christians would make an attempt on the fortress of Gouletta, he posted Sinan basha there with six thousand Turks. He was not mistaken; the emperor, having debarked his army, formed the siege of that place, and took such precautions, that the corsair could not either relieve it, or oblige him to raise the siege. As soon as the artillery had made a breach that was practicable, the emperor caused it to be stormed in his presence by a body of old Spanish infantry, who, notwithstanding an obstinate defence made by the besieged, entered. In the mean time the Italians, who were to have attacked the fortress on the side of the lake, finding that impracticable, marched round with their ladders, notwithstanding they were exposed to all the fire of the enemy's artillery, and entered upon the very heels of the Spaniards; which so intimidated the garrison, who were drawn up in the great square in good order, that, after one general discharge, they threw down their arms, and made their escape through the lake.

*Defeats
the Moor.*

THE taking this place was of prodigious consequence, for they found in the arsenal three hundred pieces of brass

<sup>d</sup> MARIANA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.
DOVAL, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA, PAULI JOVII Histor.
Justiniani Adriani.

<sup>e</sup> SAN-
DOVAL, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA, PAULI JOVII Histor.

cannon, and a great number of gallies in the port<sup>f</sup>. Many in<sup>g</sup> army, of the general officers advised the emperor, therefore, to be <sup>and re-</sup> content with his good fortune, and not push things farther, <sup>stores the</sup> at least this campaign; which extremely alarmed the poor <sup>old king of</sup> king of Tunis, who was in the camp with a very small body of cavalry, composed of such of his subjects as had followed his fortune. But the infant of Portugal and the duke of Alba insisted, that it was dishonourable for the emperor to retire without making himself master of Tunis, which was his own opinion likewise; and therefore, as soon as the army had taken some repose, he advanced towards that city. Barbarossa, who had no inclination to be shut up, and who besides had an army much superior to that of the emperor, having secured the city as well as he was able, marched to meet and give him battle; but his forces behaved so indifferently at the first attack, that he altered his sentiments, and resolved to retire again into the place, which at his return he found in a manner empty, the inhabitants of the city being fled to the mountains, and the Christian slaves having surprised the castle, so that he found it necessary to retire to Algiers<sup>g</sup>. The emperor, being thus become master of Tunis, which he could not prevent the army from plundering, restored the king Muly Houssein, with whom he made a treaty, dated the sixth of August, by which he became his vassal, and made a cession of the fortrefs of Gouletta. He returned thither; and, having put into it a garrison of a thousand Spaniards, under the command of Don Bernardin de Mendoza, with a squadron of twelve gallies under Antonio Doria, he dismissed the greatest part of his auxiliaries, and embarked for Sicily<sup>h</sup>. On the twelfth of September he made his public entry into Palermo, where he held an assembly of the states, and received a free gift, and then proceeded to Naples, where he was received with all possible magnificence. There he had the news of the death of the duke of Milan, who had left him his heir; and that Antonio de Leyva, with the Spanish troops under his command, had taken possession of that duchy on his behalf<sup>i</sup>. To moderate, however, this good news, he received an unexpected piece of intelligence, that Barbarossa had attacked Minorca, and, having granted a fair capitulation to the city of Mabon, had broke it, massacred a great part of the inhabitants, and 1535.

<sup>f</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, ALPHONSO ULLOA, SANDOVAL, <sup>g</sup> PAULI JUVII HISTOR. FERRERAS. <sup>h</sup> OCHOA, PEDRO DE SALAZAR, ADRIANI JUSTINIANI. <sup>i</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA, FERRERAS.

made slaves of above eight hundred persons, most of whom he carried to Algiers; which first excited a resolution in the emperor of attacking and making himself master of that place, as the sole means of abasing the naval power of the infidels<sup>a</sup>; an enterprize, which it had been happy for Christendom he had executed with as much success as he employed skill in the contrivance.

The war
breaks out again with Francis I.
into Savoy;
but, knowing that the issue
of war is always doubtful,
was content
to propose an accommodation.
The emperor,
who had just seen his natural daughter Margaret married to the duke of Tuscany, and found his affairs in Italy in the most flourishing condition,
was not very ready to part with so noble
a possession
as the duchy
of Milan,
more especially as the Venetians,
the most prudent and the most powerful of the Italian republics, offered
to enter into an alliance with him for its preservation<sup>1</sup>. However, it is pretended,
that he proposed to give the investiture
of Milan to the third son of the French
king, but this was after his father should have discovered his intention as to these three points.
First, Whether
he meant to make a league
with the
Turks; the next,
whether he would concur in reducing the Protestants in Germany;
and, lastly, what security he would give that the duchy of Milan should never be annexed to the crown of France. But, whatever propositions he made,
it is certain that he took all possible precautions
for making war
with success;
and, having issued his orders for that purpose, went to Rome, into which he made his public entry on the 5th of April. Not content with the interviews
he had with the pope, he caused a solemn assembly to be held at the Vatican, where all the foreign ministers,
and other persons of distinction in the city,
were present,
as well as the pope, in which he made a long and eloquent speech in support of his own cause, against the monarch
of France<sup>m</sup>.

THE death of the duke of Milan induced the French king to revive his pretensions to the duchy of Milan, though even before that event happened he had made an irruption into Savoy; but, knowing that the issue of war is always doubtful, was content to propose an accommodation. The emperor, who had just seen his natural daughter Margaret married to the duke of Tuscany, and found his affairs in Italy in the most flourishing condition, was not very ready to part with so noble a possession as the duchy of Milan, more especially as the Venetians, the most prudent and the most powerful of the Italian republics, offered to enter into an alliance with him for its preservation<sup>1</sup>. However, it is pretended, that he proposed to give the investiture of Milan to the third son of the French king, but this was after his father should have discovered his intention as to these three points. First, Whether he meant to make a league with the Turks; the next, whether he would concur in reducing the Protestants in Germany; and, lastly, what security he would give that the duchy of Milan should never be annexed to the crown of France. But, whatever propositions he made, it is certain that he took all possible precautions for making war with success; and, having issued his orders for that purpose, went to Rome, into which he made his public entry on the 5th of April. Not content with the interviews he had with the pope, he caused a solemn assembly to be held at the Vatican, where all the foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction in the city, were present, as well as the pope, in which he made a long and eloquent speech in support of his own cause, against the monarch of France<sup>m</sup>.

The emper-
or invades
France,
besieges
Mar-

AFTER he quitted that city, he went to put himself at the head of his army, in order to execute the design he had formed of entering France, contrary, as is affirmed, to the sentiments of his greatest generals. He arrived at Nice on the twenty-fifth of July, and passed from thence to Aix,

<sup>a</sup> OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA, FERRERAS.
<sup>1</sup> MEZ-RAY, PAULI JOVII Histor.
FERRERAS.

<sup>m</sup> RAINALD, DUPLEIX,

where he remained near a month; after which he undertook seilles, the siege of Marseilles, on the twenty-fifth of August <sup>n</sup>. He <sup>and is ob-</sup> did not find the reduction of that place so easy as he ex- <sup>liged to</sup> pected. At the same time Andrew Doria was upon the <sup>raise it.</sup> coast of Provence with a small fleet; and count Henry of Nassau had entered Picardy, from Flanders, with an army of twenty-six thousand men; yet, notwithstanding all these enterprises were well contrived, and executed by the best troops in Europe, they failed; for the army before Marseilles, being but indifferently supplied with provisions, had recourse to raisins and figs; and these fruits not agreeing with their constitutions, an epidemic distemper broke out, that carried off twenty thousand men, and, amongst them, Antonio de Leyva, and other old generals <sup>o</sup>. In the mean time the French army grew every day more numerous, so that on the tenth of September the emperor raised the siege, and began his retreat two days after count Nassau had done the like in Picardy, and for the same reason <sup>P</sup>. The troops on board the fleet made some descents, and burnt and plundered the country, but were constrained to retire with loss, and, the weather becoming tempestuous, were forced to return. As for the emperor, he made a good retreat; and, having quitted his army in Piedmont, went to Genoa, where he found the fleet of Andrew Doria, on board which he embarked, and, arriving safely at Barcelona on the sixth of December, proceeded from thence to Castile, where his presence was very necessary <sup>9</sup>.

1536.

In the space of a few months the emperor found his affairs extremely embarrassed. The French, in their turn, began to act offensively in Flanders and in Italy, while the Turks, apparently in concert with them, made prodigious preparations for attacking the emperor's dominions by sea, particularly the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. Charles gave orders on every side, and employed all his talents to make head against his enemies. Amongst those great qualities of which he was master, his eloquence was not the least useful, or the least considerable; and if the French drew any advantage from their alliance with the infidels, it may be doubted whether it balanced what accrued to the emperor from publishing it in the strongest manner throughout all Christendom<sup>s</sup>. It was by the help of this chiefly

His dominions attacked by the French on one side, and the Turks on the other.

<sup>a</sup> SANDOVAL, P. DANIEL.<sup>o</sup> OCHOA, ALPHONSO

ULLOA, FERRERAS.

<sup>P</sup> MEZERAY, VERA Y FIGUEROA.

MARIANA.

<sup>9</sup> DUPLEIX.<sup>s</sup> PAULI JOVIA. Hist.

Adriani, PEDRO DE SALAZAR.

that, in the states of Castile held at Valladolid, he obtained a vast subsidy; and, under pretence of providing for the defence of the coasts against the Turks, he caused an exact account to be taken, in Catalonia and Valencia, of the number of men capable to carry arms*. In the month of July he held at Moncon the states of Aragon and of the provinces annexed to it, where he likewise obtained a great supply, part of which he employed in fortifying the frontiers against the French in the summer. The Turkish fleet, in the absence of Andrew Doria, came, under the command of Lufi Bey, on the coast of Naples, and took several places, which they burnt and pillaged; but Andrew Doria, in his return, took near 20 galleys, and made slaves of the janissaries on board them†: however, having intelligence that Chairuddin basha, whom the Turks stiled Barbarossa, was coming down upon him with the whole Ottoman fleet, he retired to Messina. In the spring, and part of the summer, the war continued against the French in Flanders and in Piedmont with some advantage to the imperialists; but queen Leonora on one side, and the queen dowager of Hungary on the other, pressed the two monarchs so earnestly, that a truce was concluded and signed for three months by the two queens at Bonny, on the 30th of July‡. The pope and the Venetians procured also a truce for the like space on the side of Italy; of which when the Turkish emperor was informed, he abandoned his design against Naples, and resolved to revenge himself upon the Venetians. Towards the close of the year, Don Alvaro Bazan, general of the galleys of Spain, taking something amiss, resigned that employment; but the emperor sent him word, that he was not offended even with his demission: that he had occasion for his service; and that he should keep his post, whether he served or not; and the empress sent a person of distinction, in her name, to prevail upon him to do as the emperor desired, which, under various pretences, he declined*. The same year Alexander Medicis, duke of Florence, was murdered by his cousin Lawrence, upon which the emperor gave his dominions to Cosmo de Medicis, to whom he intended likewise to have given his daughter Margaret, the widow of the deceased†.

* OCHOA, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.

DE SALAZAR, SANDOVAL.

VERA Y FIGUEROA.

† PAULI JOVIE Histor.

‡ P. DANIEL, MEZERAY,

RAINALD, Adriani Justiniani.

THE pope, by his legates, prevailed on their imperial and most Christian majesties to have an interview at Nice, and in the mean time concluded with the emperor and the Venetians a league against the Turks. Setting out afterwards from Rome, he went to Savona by land, and, embarking on board the emperor's gallies, arrived at Nice on the 17th of May, and the next day the emperor came thither from Barcelona<sup>1</sup>. The French monarch, with his queen, his son the dauphin, and the constable Montmorency, arrived at Villafranca on the 21st<sup>2</sup>. The pontiff conferred with both princes separately, but could not engage them to meet and confer in his presence. After abundance of interviews, all he could accomplish was a truce for ten years, which was signed on the 18th of June; and a promise that they would send their plenipotentiaries to Rome, to negotiate a solid peace. The pope, making use of the emperor's gallies, returned to Genoa, and from thence to Rome<sup>3</sup>. His imperial majesty, during these conferences, saw his sister often; and being informed that the French monarch was very desirous of conferring with him alone, and would for that purpose wait for him at Aigues-mortes, he ordered Andrew Doria, when he arrived with his gallies, to steer directly for Marseilles. As soon as the fleet appeared in sight, the cannon of the citadel and town were immediately discharged, the magistrates came in a body to salute him on board his gallies, and, having kissed his hand, presented the keys of the town; with which compliment the emperor was extremely pleased<sup>4</sup>. He arrived on Sunday the 14th of July at Aigues-mortes, where he was received by king Francis in person, who went on board his gally, and was treated with all imaginable kindness and respect<sup>5</sup>. The emperor went on shore the next day, and staid till the 16th, and dined with the king, the queen, the dauphin, and the constable de Montmorency. The two monarchs had a private conference of about an hour, and parted with such exterior demonstrations of friendship, that all the world thought the peace concluded; after which, the king conducted the emperor to his gally, and he was no sooner on board than he returned to Spain. These interviews detained Andrew Doria so long, that the Christian fleet was not at sea so early as it might have been. At length it assembled towards the end of August at Corfu, consisting of one hundred thirty-six

His interview with the pope at Nice, and with the French king at Aigues-mortes, near Marseilles.

<sup>1</sup> SANDOVAL, ALPHONSO ULLOA, FERR. <sup>2</sup> P. DANIEL, MEZERAY. <sup>3</sup> RAINALD, DUPLEIX, OCHOA. <sup>4</sup> VERRAY FIGUEROA, MARIANA. <sup>5</sup> SANDOVAL.

gallies, two galleons, and thirty-nine frigates, divided into five squadrons, commanded by Francis Doria, general Grmani, general Capello, Andrew Doria, and Don Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily. They went in search of the Turkish fleet under Chairuddin Barbarossa, found it in the gulph of Galipoli, and might have fought, but that Andrew Doria declined it, which brought some imputation upon him. Soon after the Turkish fleet lost by a storm seventy gallies and twenty thousand men<sup>c</sup>. The Venetian general and Don Ferdinand de Gonzaga proposed going in pursuit of them; which Andrew Doria refused, alleging, they might meet with the like storm, and share the same fate with their enemies; upon which the fleet separated, and the squadrons retired to their respective ports. There happened this year a sedition at Milan for want of pay, another at the Gaulletta, and a third in Sicily by the same troops, for the like cause, which with great difficulty were appeased<sup>f</sup>. On the first of November the emperor held an assembly of the states of Castile and Leon at Toledo, where he endeavoured by all means to have established an excise, to which the clergy consented; but, by the persuasion of the constable of Castile, the nobility and commons opposed it so steadily, that the scheme miscarried<sup>g</sup>. The widow of Alexander Medicis was this year married to Osavio Farnese, the pope's nephew, merely to content the pontif, and to prevent his changing sides, which, at that juncture, would have been attended with great inconveniencies<sup>h</sup>.

Receives
many causes of mortification and regret in the compass
of a few months.

THE emperor kept the states sitting till the first of February, and then ordered the archbishop of Toledo to dismiss them, being exceedingly displeased that the proposition which he had made was rejected; and this, notwithstanding that, in their own way, they had granted a free gift of four hundred and fifty millions of marvadies; and gave it as their principal reason for not adopting the new one, that it might have provoked a rebellion in the raising, or have lost him the hearts of his subjects if raised<sup>i</sup>. This misfortune was followed by another; he gave a tournament on the plain of Toledo, where all things passed very well; but in the cavalcade, at their return to the city, one of the emperor's harbingers gave some coarse language to the duke de l'Infantado, and, not satisfied with that, struck his horse upon the buttock. The duke asked him very gravely, if he knew who he was; and, upon his answering in the affirmative, drew

<sup>c</sup> PAULI JOVII Histor. PEDRO DE SALAZAR, FERREAS;
<sup>f</sup> SANDOVAL.      <sup>g</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.      <sup>h</sup> RAINALD, OCHOA.      <sup>i</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA.

his sword, and cut him over the head, but hindered those who were about him from cutting him to pieces, as otherwise they certainly would have done. Upon this, Rodrigo Ronquillo, provost of the household, would have arrested the duke in the emperor's name; but the constable interposed, and said, if the duke had committed an offence, the cognisance of it belonged to him, and thereupon conducted him to his own house, whither all the nobility followed him to a man, leaving nobody with the emperor but the archbishop of Toledo, to whom he was talking. This mortified him more than any thing that had happened in his life; and yet he was so prudent as to send to the duke the next morning, to let him know that the harbinger was committed to prison, and that he might prosecute him if he pleased. The duke thanked his imperial majesty, caused the man to be cured at his own expence, and sent him a present of five hundred ducats<sup>k</sup>. This was immediately followed by another disagreeable event; the empress was delivered on the first of May of a dead child, and expired quickly after, leaving behind her Philip prince of Asturias, and two daughters, Donna Maria, who espoused the emperor Maximilian, and Donna Joanna, who in process of time became queen of Portugal<sup>l</sup>. The emperor shewed a real but a silent sorrow. Pope Jules, old as he was, no sooner heard of this event, than, under pretence of condoling, he sent his nephew cardinal Alexander Farnese to propose a match between the duke of Orleans and one of the emperor's daughters, with whom he was to give the duchy of Milan as a portion; and another match between the emperor and a daughter of the French king; which negotiation had no effect<sup>m</sup>. The deputies from the city of Ghent in Flanders applied themselves to the emperor, to obtain an exemption from a tax imposed by the queen dowager of Hungary, governess of the Low Countries, in violation, as they apprehended, of their privileges, but without receiving the redress which they expected; upon this the inhabitants revolted, expelled the queen's commissaries, and addressed themselves to the French king, as sovereign of Flanders, for protection. As this was a hasty step, it took the French king unprovided, who immediately sent their letters to the emperor, in hopes it would determine him to give the investiture of Milan to the duke of Orleans<sup>n</sup>. Charles considered this act of confidence in so strong a light, that he resolved to pass through France into Flanders, and sent Granvelle to demand a safe conduct from the French king; which he no sooner obtained, than he set out with a small retinue for St. Sebastian, leaving cardinal Tavera and the commander Cobas regents*. He was received on the frontiers by the duke of Orleans, and at St. John de Luz by the dauphin. The French historians say, that those princes offered to go into Spain as hostages for his security; but the emperor answered very gravely, that he had the faith of a king, which he looked upon as a better security. He made them the companions of his journey P.

1539.

<sup>k</sup> OCHOA, ALPHONSO ULLOA, SANDOVAL. <sup>l</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA, GONZ, OSORIO. <sup>m</sup> RAINALD, P. DANIEL, MEZERAY. <sup>n</sup> DUPLEX, FRERERAS.

He passes thro' the city of Paris, to reduce the city of Ghent.

It was impossible for a prince to be treated with greater politeness than was shewn to the emperor through his whole journey; the magistrates in every city through which he passed, presented him the keys, knelt and kissed his hand as if he had been their sovereign. The king and queen, though the former was indisposed, met him at Amboise, and conducted him to Paris, where he was complimented by the parliament, all prisoners released, the city made him a present of a silver statue of Hercules as big as the life, and, in the space of a week he staid there, all the honours were paid him that ever had been practised, or could be invented<sup>9</sup>. It is on all hands agreed that the duchy of Milan was never so much as mentioned; but some writers assert, that the French king was advised to restrain him till he granted the investiture to his son; but that the constable Montmorency interposed, and put the king in mind of his word. It is also said, that the emperor was not without his suspicions; and that, knowing how great an influence the duchess of Estampes had over the king, he took occasion, as they were talking together by the fire side, to let fall a ring of great value from his finger; which she immediately took up, and presented to him. Upon this, the emperor said, smiling, "Madam, it is yours; emperors and kings take nothing which they have once let fall." But the duchess excusing herself, on account of the value of the jewel, the emperor replied, "Keep it, it will put you in mind of my journey through France." She obeyed, and it is hinted that the expedient had the proposed effect<sup>9</sup>. At his departure from Paris, the king attended him to St. Quintin; but the dauphin and the duke of Orleans accompanied him to Valen- ciennes, where he made them rich presents *. The people of Ghent sent four ambassadors to pacify him, whom the emperor treated with great severity, and obliged them to kneel while they were speaking, and dismissed them with this answer, " Tell your companions, that I shall come as their sovereign and their judge, with the sceptre and sword in my hands †." On the arrival of his brother the king of the Romans with twelve thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, he, with the rest of his army, advanced towards Ghent, which he punished with great severity, as will be seen in its proper place. He received not long after the cardinal of Lorraine and the constable of Montmorency as ambassadors from his most Christian majesty, to demand the investiture of the duchy of Milan for the duke of Orleans. The emperor told them with great frankness, that there were two reasons why he could not grant it ; the first, that it would disoblige all the princes of Italy ; the second, that it would cut off all communication between his dominions and the state of Genoa ; but, to shew how high a price he set on the friendship of his brother Francis, he was willing to give his daughter to the duke of Orleans, with the Low Countries, and the title of king. This answer being reported to the French king, he is said to have replied, that he did not desire other people's dominions, but sought only what belonged to him by descent †. In the emperor's absence, Piali Hamet, one of Barbarossa's captains, landed with a strong detachment in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar, surprised the place, and made the principal inhabitants prisoners, with whom, and the pillage of the city, he embarked ; but, being met by Don Bernardin Mendoza with fourteen galleys from Sicily, the corsairs were all either killed or taken, and the prisoners and booty recovered. There was this year so great a famine and pestilence in Spain, that it is thought the eleventh part of the people perished w.

* MEZERAY, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA. P P, DANIEL, MEZERAY, DUPLEIX. 9 ALPHONSO ULLOA, FERRERAS. THUAN, SANDQVAL.

THE emperor, who could never lose sight of a design Resolves to that he had once formed, meditated, while in the Low Countries and in Germany, the conquest of Algiers, resolving to put in execution the carry with him a body of German foot into Italy, sending design he orders at the same time to the viceroys of Naples and Sicily, had form'd and to Andrew Doria, to assemble their respective fleets, as against well as to the regents in Spain for the same purpose, giving Algiers. the command to the duke of Alba, with orders to provide

* VERA Y FIGUEROA, OCHOA, P. DANIEL. † SANDOVAL, FERRERAS.
 † ALPHONSO ULLOA, MEZERAY.
 * PEDRO DE SALAZAR.

...id, of her son Don Carlos; but that satisfaction
amely lessened by the news of the death of his mo-ch immediately followed<sup>r</sup>. The great affairs of e, more especially those of religion, occupied all er; and about the time that it was expected he ve declared the marriage of the infanta Donna Ma- uke of Orleans died on the 8th of September, much 1545.

by the emperor, who apprehended that the war
ak out afresh; but the French king soon after sent rs to Brussels, with assurances that he meant to that good correspondence which was so lately re-
To which the emperor answered, that the peace be broken on his side. The next year was in- 1546.
it in the wars in Germany against the protestants, ablishing the inquisition at Naples, which was with a popular sedition<sup>2</sup>, and, in consequence of eral defection, which lasted, to the incredible loss gdom, several years.

beginning of the succeeding year died Henry the He makes England, and his most Christian majesty Francis a tour into which left the emperor at full liberty to pursue his the empire;
Germany; where he carried on the war against the and car-with his usual vigour, but with a strain of seve- ries all not natural to him, and which we have rea- things proceeded rather from political views than there with ken zeal; and the disturbances in the kingdom a high continued<sup>2</sup>. An attempt was made at Genoa hand.

of prince Doria, by the count de Fiesque, in e of Parma had some concern; and it was not liated by his assassination: upon which Don Saga seized the city of Placentia for the emrew some suspicions upon him, and even upon
The prince Don Philip held a general assembly 1547:
Arragon, and obtained a considerable free

wards sent his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva
his father at Augsburgh upon his victories, him with the state of affairs in Spain<sup>c</sup>.
majesty was every day more and more em- Don Phi- religious disputes in the empire, where his lip's tri-asures were unacceptable to, and suspected umphant re especially that great measure of the journey to

<sup>1</sup> DANIEL, FERRERAS.

<sup>2</sup> A, MEZERAY.

[I.

at.

<sup>2</sup> SANDOVAL,

<sup>3</sup> Lord HERBERT'S

<sup>b</sup> ALPH. ULLOA.

<sup>c</sup> SAN-

every thing in abundance for an expedition of great importance, and to have all things ready against his return. He had the year before procured the pope's bulls for raising money upon the clergy, and resolved, in his passage thro' Italy, to meet and confer with him at Lucca, to which proposed his holiness, though sinking under the weight of years, readily consented, as having several things of moment to offer to his consideration, and more especially to labour the conclusion of a solid peace with the crown of France. The emperor entered Italy from Tirol in the decline of summer, and made some stay at Milan, where he married his niece, the daughter of the queen of Denmark, to the prince of Lorrain; which is generally ascribed to the pique he had taken at the French king's giving the daughter of Henry d'Albret, though a child, in marriage to the duke of Cleves, who laid claim to the duchy of Gueldres, and might, in consequence of this marriage, disturb the emperor about other pretensions. He proceeded from Milan to Genoa, and from thence to Lucca. There the French ambassadors made heavy complaints of the breach of the truce by the death of two gentlemen, who were assassinated by persons in masks not far from Milan, by order, as it was said, of the governor, who had intelligence that they were charged with a secret commission and instructions to negotiate with the grand signor. This Francis the first magnified into a breach of faith, and an insult on the law of nations; while the emperor Charles treated it only as a pretence taken by the French to begin the war in concert with the Turks. While he remained at Lucca, he made three visits to the pope, who returned one. In these visits the emperor pressed the pope to call a general council, and to support the catholic league; and the pope was very earnest with him to preserve the peace of Italy, by making a cession of the duchy of Milan, which he peremptorily refused. This interview being over, the emperor, notwithstanding Andrew Doria and the marquis del Vasto laboured all they could to persuade him that the season was too far advanced, embarked, in order to execute his enterprize upon Algiers.

1541.

Which,
however,
is attended
with the

THE weather proved so bad, that he was forced to put into Corfica, Sardinia, and Minorca, before he reached Majorca, where the rendezvous was to be. He sailed from thence to the coast of Africa with a fleet of two hundred

* SACREDO, CANTEMIR, VERA Y FIGUEROA. † RAY-NALD, ALPHONSO ULLOA, SANDOVAL. ‡ OCHOA, FERR.
• P. DANIEL, MEZERAY. † RAINALD.

large ships and one hundred smaller vessels, besides a squadron of seventy galleys, having on board six thousand Spanish foot, five thousand Italians, eight thousand Germans, three thousand volunteers, and two thousand horse, exclusive of the ordinary equipage of the galleys, his own, and those of the nobility who attended him. He arrived in sight of Algiers on the 20th of October, and debarked his troops the next day. The siege was long and perilous, the defence very gallant and well conducted; the Christian fleet was for the most part beat to pieces by tempests, so that at length he was forced to rise from before the place with great loss. It is said, that, after the retreat, the famous Hernando Cortes, who conquered Mexico, offered, on the forfeiture of his life, to return with the army, and take Algiers; but, the contrary measure being resolved, his imperial majesty embarked, and landed in the kingdom of Murcia on the fifth of December, extremely mortified at this reverse of fortune.

The misfortunes of the former year constrained the emperor to act intirely upon the defensive. With this view he went in person into Arragon and Catalonia, and afterwards into Navarre, apprehensive that the French would attempt somewhat in favour of Henry of Bourbon, who had assumed the title of monarch of that country. It is certain that the French designed, in virtue of the potent alliances they had made, and their vast military preparations, to have attacked the emperor on all sides, and almost in every part of his dominions, at once, but they met likewise with disappointments; however, the war was carried on with heat in the Low Countries, though with very little advantage, the same places being taken and retaken in the space of a few weeks; so that, except rendering a fruitful country a desert, there happened little alteration on that side. In Piedmont things went very much at the same rate; and the duke of Savoy had the misfortune to see his country destroyed by two princes, one of whom was his near relation, and to the other he was closely allied, without having any share or interest in the quarrel. In the autumn the dauphin, with an army of between forty and fifty thousand men, besieged Perpignan; but, after having spent a long time before it, and wasted a great many men, he was constrained to retire. The emperor called the states of Arragon and Catalonia to-

The dauphin lays siege to Perpignan with a numerous army, and is obliged to raise it.

1542.

<sup>a</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, SAGREDO, CANTEMIR.

DANIEL, MEZERAY, SANDOVAL.

FERRERAS.

<sup>d</sup> P. DUPLEIX, OCHOA,

<sup>f</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA, MARIANA.

gether at Moncon, where they took the oath of fidelity to the prince Don Philip, and granted the emperor a free gift of half a million of ducats<sup>g</sup>. He went from thence to Barcelona, where the prince swore to maintain the privileges and exemptions of that principality; and went afterwards with his father, for the same purpose, to Valentia, where the emperor obtained a large free gift, and the states likewise made a very generous present to the prince his son<sup>h</sup>. There was this year a scarcity of provisions, occasioned by vast flights of locusts, that fell more especially in Old Castile, and devoured all the fruits of the earth.

Success of
the imperialists on all sides
against the French
and the Turks.

A DEFENSIVE war, however successful, was by no means acceptable to the emperor, who therefore meditated all this time a war of another kind; previous to which, he found it necessary to conclude the marriage of his son the prince Don Philip with the infanta Donna Maria of Portugal; and a treaty with Henry the eighth of England, which was signed in the month of February, at London, and was very explicit<sup>i</sup>. These points settled, he thought of nothing but passing into Flanders, believing that on that side it was most practicable to distress France. He committed the regency, during his absence, to his son the prince of Asturias, and assigned him the duke of Alba to assist him in military affairs, and his secretary Cobos in all points of another nature. He likewise put into his hands a paper, containing a succinct detail of what might happen in his absence, with his instructions upon every point<sup>k</sup>. These necessary measures taken, he embarked at Barcelona, on board the galleys of Andrew Doria, and arrived safely at Genoa. The pope was very desirous of a conference, and sent the cardinal nephew to request it; which the emperor would have declined, but, finding himself so warmly pressed, he consented at length to an interview at Bossetto, a castle between Parma and Placentia; but, as it might have been easily foreseen, it had no effect, for the emperor was bent upon chastising the duke of Cleves, and making his rival Francis sensible of his superiority<sup>l</sup>. While his imperial majesty was pursuing this plan, Chairuddin Barbarossa, with the Turkish fleet, having first spoiled Calabria, alarmed Sicily, and insulted Italy, proceeded to the coasts of France, and, being joined by the naval force of that country, the French and Turkish fleets landed a nume-

<sup>g</sup> SANDOVAL, FERRERAS.

OCHOA, MARIANA.

<sup>l</sup> GOES, OSORIO, FARIA Y SOUSA,
Lord HERBERT's History of Henry VIII.

<sup>i</sup> RAINALD, ALPHONSO ULLOA.

<sup>h</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA,

<sup>k</sup> FERRER.

rous corps of troops, and, in conjunction with them, besieged the town and fortrefs of Nice. The former they took by composition; but the citadel continued to make a long and brave defence, till the marquis del Vasto approached with an army of twelve thousand men under his command; upon which the allies raised the siege, the French squadron retiring to Marseilles, and the Turks to Toulon<sup>m</sup>. The emperor was still more successful where he commanded in person, since he compelled the duke of Cleves to have recourse to his clemency, and extended it to him in a high degree, after making him thoroughly sensible of his displeasure. He likewise promised the distressed king of Tunis, who apprehended the great armament Barbarossa then made was to dispossess him of his dominions, his support and protection, and gave him leave to reside at Naples till that could be conveniently done<sup>n</sup>. 1543

THE fate of war is ever uncertain; but the issue of negotiations, wisely conducted, is rarely so. The French arms were successful in Piedmont<sup>o</sup>; and the imperialists, though commanded by the marquis del Vasto, the best officer they had left, were thoroughly beaten in the neighbourhood of Carignan, on the 10th of April, by which that and some other places fell into their hands; but the marquis del Vasto repaired this loss by his extraordinary diligence, and by his fertility in expedients, which were the result of his great skill and long experience in the art of war<sup>p</sup>. In the month of May, Barbarossa sailed for Constantinople, and took the command of a fleet which had been for some time preparing there, with which he ravaged the coast of the kingdom of Naples, and carried many thousand persons of both sexes into slavery. He meditated still greater mischiefs, which were prevented only by his death, that happened soon after by a flux, when he was upwards of fourscore<sup>q</sup>. A French fleet, that was sent to ravage the coasts of Galicia, was not so successful; for Don Alvaro Bazan, who had resumed the command of the Spanish gallies, engaged and beat them<sup>r</sup>. The greatest efforts, however, in this campaign, were made on the side of the Low Countries and in France; for the emperor, having brought over king Henry of England with a numerous army, which was employed in besieging Boulogne, marched in person with a corps of thirty-six thousand men,

<sup>m</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, SAGREDO. CANTEMIR.
DOVAL, MARIANA, FERRERAS. <sup>o</sup> MEZERAY.
PHONSO ULLOA, OCHOA. <sup>q</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.

<sup>n</sup> SAN-
<sup>p</sup> AL-
<sup>r</sup> SAN-

1544.

and invested Montreuil, while the count de Furstemberg, with a body of German troops, recovered Luxemburgh. The emperor, clearly perceiving that his rival was unable to defend himself against two such powerful enemies at a time, pushed the operations of the war with such vigour, that, after taking Chateau Thierry, it was expected he would have marched to Paris; which threw the inhabitants of that great city into such consternation, that many of them retired to Rouen, Orleans, and other places<sup>s</sup>. But the emperor, when he arrived at Soissons, made a halt, as if he expected some application should be made to him. Accordingly, father Martin de Guzman, who some say was confessor to the queen of France, and others affirm to have been following his studies there, came thither by direction of their most Christian majesties, and testified how much they were inclined to peace<sup>t</sup>. Upon this, plenipotentiaries were sent to Chateau de Crespy on both sides, and the treaty concluded on the 18th of September, the principal points of which were, that the emperor should give his daughter the infanta Donna Maria to the duke of Orleans, with the Low Countries and the counties of Burgundy and Charolois; or his niece, the daughter of the king of the Romans, with the duchy of Milan; but he was to retain the citadels of Milan and Cremona till there was an heir male of the marriage; and all places taken since the truce of Nice were to be restored; the French king renewing the renunciations made by the treaties of Madrid and Cambray<sup>u</sup>. The loss of Boulogne to the English hastened this treaty very much. After it was concluded, the emperor went himself to Crespy, where the duke of Orleans met him, whom he treated with great kindness and affection, and called him constantly his son. This year the king of Tremecen was restored to his dominions by the voluntary assistance of some of the Spanish nobility<sup>w</sup>.

The birth
of the prince Don Carlos,
which is accompanied with the death
of his mother.

THE peace being made, both princes concurred in obliging pope Paul the third to summon the council of Trent, which he did by a bull dated in November, and appointed it to meet on the 15th of March<sup>x</sup>. The emperor passing the winter at Brussels, the queen of France went thither, and carried the duke of Orleans with her; and the cheerfulness of the court was not a little increased by the news of the princess of Asturias being delivered on the 8th of January.

<sup>s</sup> P. DANIEL, Lord HERBERT's History of Henry VIII. SANDOVAL.

<sup>t</sup> DUPLEIX, ALPHONSO ULLOA, FERR.

<sup>u</sup> MEZERAY, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA.

<sup>w</sup> PEDRO

DE SALAZAR, SAGREDO.

<sup>x</sup> RAINALD.

at Valladolid, of her son Don Carlos; but that satisfaction was extremely lessened by the news of the death of his mother, which immediately followed<sup>r</sup>. The great affairs of the empire, more especially those of religion, occupied all the summer; and about the time that it was expected he would have declared the marriage of the infanta Donna Maria, the duke of Orleans died on the 8th of September, much regretted by the emperor, who apprehended that the war would break out afresh; but the French king soon after sent ambassadors to Brussels, with assurances that he meant to maintain that good correspondence which was so lately restored. To which the emperor answered, that the peace would not be broken on his side. The next year was entirely spent in the wars in Germany against the protestants, and in establishing the inquisition at Naples, which was attended with a popular sedition<sup>z</sup>, and, in consequence of that, a general defection, which lasted, to the incredible loss of that kingdom, several years.

1545.

1546.

In the beginning of the succeeding year died Henry the eighth of England, and his most Christian majesty Francis the first, which left the emperor at full liberty to pursue his designs in Germany; where he carried on the war against the protestants with his usual vigour, but with a strain of severity that was not natural to him, and which we have reason to doubt proceeded rather from political views than from a mistaken zeal; and the disturbances in the kingdom of Naples still continued<sup>a</sup>. An attempt was made at Genoa upon the life of prince Doria, by the count de Fiesque, in which the duke of Parma had some concern; and it was not long after retaliated by his assassination: upon which Don Ferdinand Gonçaga seized the city of Placentia for the emperor; which drew some suspicions upon him, and even upon his master<sup>b</sup>. The prince Don Philip held a general assembly of the states of Arragon, and obtained a considerable free gift; and afterwards sent his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva to compliment his father at Augsburgh upon his victories, and to acquaint him with the state of affairs in Spain<sup>c</sup>.

He makes a tour into the empire, and carries all things there with a high hand.

1547.

His imperial majesty was every day more and more embarrassed by the religious disputes in the empire, where his notions and his measures were unacceptable to, and suspected by both parties, more especially that great measure of the

Don Philip's triumphant journey to

<sup>r</sup> OCHOA, P. DANIEL, FERRERAS.

VERA Y FIGUEROA, MEZERAY.

History of Henry VIII.

BOVAL, &amp; al. sup. citat.

<sup>z</sup> SANDOVAL,<sup>a</sup> LORD HERBERT'S<sup>b</sup> ALPH. ULLOA.<sup>c</sup> SAN-visit the emperor in the Low Countries.

1548.

interim, which was properly speaking his own, and to which he was driven by the pope's transferring the council from Trent to Bologna; against which the emperor protested, but to no purpose<sup>d</sup>. This embarrassed state of things making his presence absolutely necessary, and as his great point was to preserve all his dignities, as well as to transmit all his dominions to the prince his son, he judged it necessary to have him near his person. Having prevailed upon his brother, the king of the Romans, to let his son prince Maximilian go into Spain, he sent him through the Milanese to Genoa, from whence, on board Doria's gallies, he passed to Barcelona, where he arrived on the 5th of August, and, on his arrival at Valladolid, espoused, in virtue of a dispensation from the pope, the infanta Donna Maria, the emperor's daughter, who had been promised to the duke of Orleans<sup>e</sup>. As soon as the rejoicings for this marriage were over, that is, in the beginning of October, the prince Don Philip devolved the administration upon his cousin Maximilian, and set out for Barcelona, with a train so numerous and so splendid, that the Spanish writers assure us nothing like it was ever seen before, or has been seen since<sup>f</sup>. The first actions of princes are characteristic; and the same dignity, circumspection, magnificence, regularity, and oeconomy, which appeared in this voyage, were discernible in all the great actions of Philip's life. He embarked at Roses in Catalonia, went from thence to Perpignan, and, after having seen and examined it, returned to his fleet, touched twice upon the coast of France, proceeded from thence to Villa Franca, and landed at Savona, from whence he went to Genoa in one of the gallies of the republic<sup>g</sup>. He was received there, as he had been every-where, with all possible honours and respect, and gave the Italian princes and states leisure to make their addresses to him. He took a view of the field of battle of Pavia, as his father had done, and, proceeding from thence to Milan, passed his Christmas in that city, and conferred with all the great men in Italy on points of every kind, with a modesty and affability which were not afterwards so conspicuous in his conduct.

His great humility,
when in-introduced

IN the beginning of the year prince Philip set out from Milan, and, taking Mantua in his way, arrived at Trent, from whence he went to Innsbruck, thence to Saltzburg and Munich, and so to Augsburgh, receiving all the princes ecclesia-

<sup>d</sup> RAINALD, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA.
VAL, FERRERAS.
& al. sup. citat.

<sup>f</sup> MARIANA.

<sup>e</sup> SANDO-
<sup>g</sup> MEZERAY,

stic and secular of the empire, and from thence to Luxem-into his burgh, from whence by slow journie. he repaired to Brussels, father's where, when he was introduced to his father's presence, he fell at his feet, and kissed his hand. The emperor received him with great affection, and caused the states of the Low Countries to acknowlege him in quality of duke of Brabant<sup>h</sup>. About this time died Paul the third, of whom the emperor is reported to have said to his son, that if his body was opened, in order to be embalmed, they would find fleur-de-lis's stamped upon his heart<sup>i</sup>.

1549.

THE cardinal de Monte being raised to the papal throne, assumed the name of Julius the third, and gave immediate notice of it to the emperor and to the prince. Though at first they were well pleased with his election, yet they did not find him afterwards so favourable as they expected; and both the emperor's great projects of subduing the protestants, and procuring for his son the reversion of the empire, miscarried, though they were conducted with all possible address<sup>k</sup>. The war was still carried on in the Mediterranean between Andrew Doria, who had now the title of prince, which he very justly deserved, and Dragut, a Turkish pirate, who had been bred up under Barbarossa, and succeeded him in his command, which, as it kept the seamen of Italy and Spain in breath, so it certainly contributed to raise that naval force by which the maritime power of the infidels was kept from rising under those experienced officers that Barbarossa had bred, and was afterwards, when they were worn out, in a manner destroyed<sup>l</sup>.

1550.

As the emperor was firm, or rather positive, in the measures he formed, so, having taken fresh steps for carrying them into execution, he hoped they would have better success this year; and therefore, finding that the presence of Philip made no impression on a German diet, he conceived it more for his interest to return to Spain, more especially as clouds began to gather in several quarters. Henry the second inherited his father's resentments as well as his dominions; he procured an entrance into Italy, by taking the young duke of Parma, Octavio Farnese, under his protection; he entered into a secret confederacy with the protestant princes of the empire, much oppressed by the emperor, who meant to oppress them more; and, as if he acted in concert, the grand signor equipped a great fleet, and threat-

*Embarrassed by the fresh conjunction between the infidels
and the French.*

<sup>h</sup> OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA, SANDOVAL.
<sup>k</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>i</sup> RAINALD.
<sup>l</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, SAGREDO, OCHOA.

him with a large sum of money, to deliver his country from the impending danger. The bargain was quickly made; and Mermila, going very secretly to Dragut, instead of informing him, as he was commanded, that the French galleys were coming to join him, assured him, in the name of king Henry, that he was unable to act in concert with him that year, but had sent him two hundred thousand ducats towards the expences of the next; which Dragut believing, returned immediately towards Constantinople*. A few days after arrived the prince of Salerno with the French fleet, who, finding that the infidels were retired, followed, in order to bring them back, which design carried him likewise to Constantinople, so that the emperor's dominions on this side were free for that year. The emperor, in the mean while, having drawn together a potent army, marched to Inspruck, and from thence to Germany, directing his march towards the Low Countries. The design of this expedition was to recover Metz, Toul, and Verdun, which the French king had surpris'd during the troubles; but, not arriving till it was late in the year, his design in a great measure miscarried, which, with the insurrection of the city of Sienna in Italy, in favour of the French, renewed his chagrin, and induced him to question that good fortune upon which he had formerly so much relied. The prince Don Philip procured from the states of the respective kingdoms in Spain very large supplies; and, having received his father's consent, concluded the marriage of his sister the infanta Donna Joanna, with the prince of Portugaly.

The quarrel between the imperialists
and French
carried on with vigour.

THE distracted state of affairs, the many enemies they had to deal with, and the repeated demands of his father for supplies of money, embarrassed the prince Don Philip, notwithstanding the vast sums he had drawn by repeated free gifts from the states, and obliged him to entertain a project, which, if carried into execution, must have been at the expence of the church; but the Spanish clergy first exposed it so effectually in writing, and opposed it afterwards with such steadiness, that the prince thought fit to desist<sup>2</sup>. In Italy the imperialists bent their whole force to the reduction of Sienna; but the subjects of that little republic, being most of them rich, enlisted so many foreigners in their service, and exerted themselves with such spirit and intrepidity, that, though much blood was spilt, there was not much

* SANDOVAL, PEDRO DE SALAZAR, FERRERAS.
CHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA, GOES.

<sup>2</sup> PEDRO MEXIA. gained

him, it was their custom to put their dominions in a posture of defence when armies were near them, though they had no share in the quarrel; but that his imperial majesty need be in no pain on that head, since the troops they had, and the troops they were raising, were intirely at his devotion, and he might employ them as he thought proper. This well-timed compliment had a good effect, and recovered his spirits; and when he saw that the old elector John Frederic of Saxony, whom in this confusion he released from a long imprisonment, refused to quit his person, and gave the highest marks of unshaken fidelity, he laboured to restore his affairs, and consented to the pacification of Passau, which afforded him time to take his measures<sup>a</sup>. He sent immediately to his son prince Philip for men and money, and dispatched Andrew Doria with his gallies to bring both. The prince Don Philip executed his father's orders with such diligence, that the supplies were ready when the gallies arrived, so that the emperor was quickly in a condition to protect his Italian dominions<sup>c</sup>. However, the prince of Salerno, to revenge himself for some real or pretended affront that he had received from Don Pedro de Toledo, viceroy of Naples, went over to the French, and, besides a large pension, was declared general of the gallies which were to be sent into the Mediterranean<sup>d</sup>. The Turks had sent Dragut, with a very powerful fleet, to act against the emperor, and he sacked many places in the island of Sicily: from the middle of July to the beginning of August he appeared daily before Naples, which threw that city into vast confusion, till at length Andrew Doria arrived with the Christian fleet, and, to put an end to these terrors, engaged the infidels: but, for the first time, he was completely beaten, with the loss of six gallies and seven hundred Germans, with several officers of distinction on board; upon which, with the shattered remains of his fleet, he retired to Sardinia<sup>e</sup>.

1552.

THE consequences of this misfortune might have been terrible, if, by an unforeseen accident, they had not been prevented. Charles Mermila, a Neapolitan exile, who had fled for shelter into France, was intrusted by king Henry with an important message to Dragut. This man, coming to Rome, discovered himself to cardinal Mendoza, to whom he offered, if the emperor would pardon him, and furnish

An accident saves the kingdom of Naples from being over-run by the Turks.

<sup>a</sup> JUSTINIANI SANDOVAL, OCHOA, ALPHONSO ULLOA.
<sup>c</sup> ADRIANI, FERRERAS. <sup>d</sup> P. DANIEL, MEZERAY. <sup>e</sup> PEDRO DE SALAZAR, SAGREDO, CANTEMIR.

1554.

St James of Campostella <sup>k</sup>. He sailed from Corunna with a very numerous fleet, attended by the principal nobility of Castile and Arragon, and arrived at Southampton on the nineteenth <sup>h</sup>, or, as some writers say, on the twentieth of July. He sent from thence his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva, with a present of jewels to the queen, of the value of one hundred thousand ducats. The marriage was celebrated on the feast of St. James, and, when their titles were proclaimed, those of Naples and Sicily were added in virtue of the emperor's resignation, which had been sent a little before <sup>l</sup>. After the rejoicings for the marriage were over, most of the Spanish nobility returned; and the prince sent four thousand Spanish troops, that were on board his fleet, to his father in France <sup>k</sup>. In Italy the war was carried on with vigour by the duke of Florence or of Tuscany, against the French; but in the Low Countries the French king took several places, and wasted the country, notwithstanding the emperor had built two new fortresses, which he stiled Charleroi and Philipville; but the emperor, towards the close of the campaign, forced the king to raise the siege of Renty, and afterwards made an irruption into Picardy <sup>l</sup>.

Charles
takes a resolution of quitting
the world,
and resigns
to his son.

THE vast extent of his dominions, and the multiplicity of affairs which occupied his attention, joined to a precarious state of health, had for some time rendered the emperor thoughtful and reserved. His melancholy was much increased by the news of his mother's death, which happened on the 12th of April, and which put him in mind that it was time for him to execute what he had formerly meditated, and even proposed to the queens of Hungary and France, which was an abdication and retreat <sup>m</sup>. The mortification that he daily met with contributed not a little to fix him in this disposition; the death of pope Julius the third, and of his successor Marcellus the second, who sat but three weeks, and the election of cardinal Caraffa, who assumed the name of Paul the fourth, afforded him much disquiet <sup>n</sup>. He laboured to live at least upon good terms with the last-mentioned pontiff; and, sacrificing his resentment against his nephew, who had deserted his service for that of the king of France, he did him the honour to nominate him to a hat, which he received with great expressions of gratitude, as his uncle bestowed it with all the exterior

<sup>k</sup> SANDOVAL, FERRERAS.

<sup>k</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.

<sup>l</sup> RAPIN'S History of England.

<sup>k</sup> GODWIN'S Annals.

<sup>l</sup> JUSTINIANI ADRIANI, MEZERAY, P. DANIEL.

<sup>m</sup> MA-

YERNE TURQUET, MARIANA.

<sup>n</sup> RAINALD.

signs of pleasure<sup>o</sup>; but in a short time after, this cardinal persuaded the pope, who was very old and suspicious, that the emperor designed to depose him; upon which, in violation of the law of nations, he seized the cardinal Sforza, the emperor's ambassador, and sent him to the castle of St. Angelo<sup>p</sup>. The civil and military affairs in his Italian dominions fell into such confusion, that he was compelled, in conjunction with his son, to name the duke of Alba to be vicar-general there, that he might reduce them into some order<sup>q</sup>. The Turkish fleet, at the solicitation of the French, came again upon the coasts of Naples and Sicily, insulted Tuscany, and rode triumphant in the Mediterranean; while the Algerine corsairs made themselves masters of Bugia on the coast of Africa<sup>r</sup>. The congress that had been held at Calais, at the solicitation of his daughter the queen of England, proved abortive<sup>s</sup>: upon the whole, considering the perplexed state of things, and his own declining condition, he sent for his son Don Philip into Flanders, and, having first resigned to him the grand mastership of the order of the Golden Fleece, he, on the 25th of October, in a full assembly of the states at Brussels, in the presence of the two queens his sisters, and of the duke of Savoy, made a full resignation of all the hereditary dominions of the Low Countries, and of Burgundy, in favour of the king Don Philip<sup>t</sup>, after having, in a long speech, declared the motives to this resolution, and recommended in the most pathetic terms the same fidelity and duty to his son which himself had experienced in the great officers of state and nobility who were present; and this with such dignity, and so becoming an eloquence, that the whole audience melted into tears. Don Philip, kneeling, kissed his hand, and made a short speech; after which, the emperor, being quite exhausted with the fatigue of the solemnity, withdrew<sup>w</sup>. After this, king Philip, being persuaded that the most Christian king had sincere intentions of peace, consented to name commissioners to treat of a temporary truce, that might afford them leisure to regulate the various points that were to be settled by it; and with this prospect of tranquillity, which was very acceptable to all parties, this year concluded.

1555.

<sup>o</sup> SANDOVAL, RAINALD.      <sup>p</sup> FERRERAS.      <sup>q</sup> JUSTINIANI ADRIANI, OCHOA, VERA Y FIGUEROA.      <sup>r</sup> CANTEMIR, P. DANIEL.      <sup>s</sup> GODWIN'S Annals.      <sup>t</sup> Corps Universal Diplomatique, tom. iv. lib. iii. p. 93.      <sup>u</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA.      <sup>w</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA, LUIS CABRERA, Historia del Rey de Espana Don Phelippe II. fo. 1619. MEZERAY.

Disposes
every thing for his voyage
into Spain,
and embarks for Zealand.

ACCORDING to the best lights that can be obtained from history, we may venture to affirm, that the emperor resigned all his Spanish dominions to his son in the month of January; but it is not easy, perhaps it is not practicable, to fix the day; Ferreras <sup>x</sup> says it was on the first, others <sup>y</sup> say the sixth, others the tenth, others the fifteenth; but Sandoval <sup>z</sup>, who has printed the very act of abdication, shews us, that it was not signed till the sixteenth. As soon as it was known in Spain, measures were taken for proclaiming the new sovereign with all possible ceremony, that, as this was in all respects a new case, the people might entertain no doubts or difficulties about it <sup>a</sup>. Accordingly, at Valladolid, where the court then was, a kind of theatre was erected in the most public part of the city on the 28th of March, about five in the afternoon, to which the prince Don Carlos, the ambassador of Portugal, the principal grandees, and the prelates, repaired <sup>b</sup>; and the voluntary resignation of his catholic majesty Charles the first being declared, the young prince, with the assistance of Antonio de Roxas, his governor, threw out the standard which he held till then wrapped up in his hand, crying out, “ Castile, Castile, for the king Don Philip “ our sovereign;” which standard was afterwards carried through the principal streets of the city <sup>c</sup>. The emperor remained, after his abdication, some months at Brussels; and, upon declaring his resolution to return into Spain, and there to pass the remainder of his days, the archduke Maximilian and the infanta Donna Maria came thither to take their leave of him <sup>d</sup>. After their departure, the emperor took leave of his son, and is said to have given him such observations upon government as his great abilities and long experience furnished <sup>e</sup>. He wrote also to Mary queen of England, to apologize for the absence of his son; and it is remarkable, that, in this letter, he tells her, that they could not either of them quit the Low Countries before, without running their affairs into confusion <sup>f</sup>. When he was informed that the fleet which was to escort him was assembled, he set out from Brussels for Ghent, where he was on the 26th of August; as appears by a rescript of his, directed to the bishop of Osna-brug, president of the imperial chamber at Spire, in which

<sup>x</sup> Historia general de Espana, P. xiii. sect. 8.      <sup>y</sup> VERA
Y FIGUEROA, HERRERA.      <sup>z</sup> Historia de la Vida y Hechos
del Emperador Carlos V.      <sup>a</sup> ALPHONSO ULLOA, FER-RERAS.      <sup>b</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA.      <sup>c</sup> SANDOVAL, MARIANA.      <sup>d</sup> PEDRO MEXIA.      <sup>e</sup> SANDOVAL, FERR.:
<sup>f</sup> STRYPE's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 302.

he informs him of his resignation in favour of his son, and of his intention to devolve the imperial authority on his brother Ferdinand, king of the Romans. He went from thence to Sudbourg, in the isle of Zealand, where, by a public edict, directed to the electors, and other princes of the empire, which in a great measure repeats the former, he commits the government of the empire to his brother Ferdinand; and directs that the same duty and obedience should be paid to him as to himself<sup>h</sup>; so that, notwithstanding what some historians have said, these are neither of them resignations. This last is dated on the 7th of September, and ten days after he embarked with his sisters, the queens of Hungary and France, for Spain; but was driven in his passage into an English port, from whence, on the 20th of the same month, he wrote to his daughter the queen of England<sup>i</sup>, to excuse his son's stay, and his not making her a visit, which he ascribes to the bad state of his health, and to the advanced season of the year, which made it requisite for him to lose no time in pursuing his voyage; and it is probable he sailed again either on that day or the day following.

He arrived safely at Laredo in Biscay on the 28th of the same month; and, after remaining there some days to recover the fatigue of the voyage, he set out for Burgos. There are some who pretend that he was mortified when he perceived that few of the nobility came to meet him, which, as it must be a conjecture, so, if we consider the character of this prince, we can scarce think it probable<sup>k</sup>. He had, upon mature reflection, preferred retirement at his age to the highest dignities; and this supposes that in a very short time he preferred a croud of courtiers, at least, if not flatterers, to that retirement he had sought. He went from thence to Valladolid, where he saw his grandson Don Carlos<sup>l</sup>; and from Valladolid, accompanied by the two queens his sisters, he set out upon a rainy day, which shews how desirous he was of getting thither, for the place he had chosen for his retreat. This was the monastery of St. Justus, belonging to the order of Hieronymites, next in authority to the Carthusians, seated in the Vera de Placentia, which all who have seen it describe as one of the sweetest and pleasantest places in Europe<sup>m</sup>. He resided in a little house built near the

Retires to the convent of St. Justus in Estramadura, and remains to his decease.

<sup>h</sup> Corps Univ. Diplom. tom. iv. P. i. p. 4. Memorials, vol. iii. p. 307.

SAYE, BAYLE, VARILLAS.

<sup>m</sup> Les Delices de l'Espagne, par Don JUAN ALVAREZ DE COLMENAR, Tour through Spain and Portugal, by UDAL AP RHYS, p. 113.

<sup>l</sup> STRYPE'S

<sup>k</sup> AMELOT DE LA HOUS-

<sup>i</sup> SANDOVAL, FERRERAS.

convent, employed himself in acts of piety and devotion, and practised for his amusement some of the mechanic arts <sup>n</sup>. It is certain that king Philip consulted him in the beginning of the ensuing year, by his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva, upon the most proper methods of raising men and money in Spain, and upon the expediency of the prince Don Carlos passing into Flanders: as to the first part of his commission, he gave him the best council in his power, and dissuaded the last <sup>o</sup>. He did not actually resign the empire till the beginning of the year 1558, when the ensigns of the imperial dignity were sent to the diet by the prince of Orange, the vice-chancellor of the empire, and his secretary P. He was so desirous of fulfilling, in the most exact manner, the duties of that station which was the result of his own choice, that he would not permit the two queens to reside at Placentia as they would have done, that his meditations might be the less disturbed <sup>q</sup>. In this state he was found, but not surprised, by that death he had long expected, and to which he submitted with all exterior marks of humility, piety, and patience, on the 21st of September the same year, in the 59th year of his age <sup>r</sup>. Donna Leonora, queen dowager of Portugal and France, upon her return into Castile from a visit she had made her daughter in the first-mentioned kingdom, died, after a short illness, a few months before him <sup>s</sup>; Donna Maria, queen dowager of Hungary, within the compass of the same month <sup>t</sup>; and his daughter-in-law, queen Mary of England, within the space of two months <sup>u</sup>.

Account of his legiti-mate and illegitimate offspring,
and other particulars.

THIS great prince, by his empress Donna Isabella of Portugal, had many sons, none of which survived beyond the age of infancy, except his successor Don Philip, and two daughters, the infanta Donna Maria, who espoused the archduke Maximilian, son to Ferdinand king of the Romans, and who was himself afterwards emperor, and the infanta Donna Joanna, princess of Portugal <sup>w</sup>. As to his natural children, there are many doubts and disputes: he had by a Dutch lady a daughter Margaret, first married to Cosmo de Medicis, duke of Florence, and, after his demise, to Ottavio Farnese, duke of Parma, by whom she was the mother of Alexander Farnese, one of the greatest captains of his age <sup>x</sup>.

<sup>n</sup> SANDOVAL, ALPHONSO ULLOA, FERRERAS.      <sup>o</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA, LUIS CABRERA.

<sup>p</sup> SURIUS, THUANUS, RAINALD.

<sup>q</sup> VERA Y FIGUEROA, & al. supra citat.

<sup>r</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET, MARIANA.      <sup>s</sup> OSORIO, FA-

RIA Y SOUSA.      <sup>t</sup> BAYLE.      <sup>u</sup> GODWIN'S Annals.

<sup>w</sup> GOES.      <sup>x</sup> SANDOVAL, & al. ubi sup.

By

By another lady he had a son, who was the famous Don Juan of Austria, who was bred up by the emperor's faithful servant Lewis Quixada, without knowing who was his father, and who considered Margaret Ulloa, the wife of Quixada, as his mother <sup>y</sup>. At his departure from Brussels, it is said the emperor acquainted Don Philip, that he had a brother, and where he was. Upon this discovery, Don Juan discerned, that the wife of Quixada was not his mother. He was afterwards told, that a German lady of Ratiston, Barbara de Blomberg, was his mother, and he thought her so to his death <sup>z</sup>. But some modern writers, upon the credit of the jesuit Strada, have surmised, that his birth was not less illustrious on the side of his mother than his father, which, however favoured by great writers, is liable to many difficulties <sup>a</sup>. Those who say that the emperor had another natural son, whose name was Priam Conrad, are mistaken; he was the son of Barbara Blomberg, by her husband, and therefore Don Juan considered him as his half-brother <sup>b</sup>. Some mention <sup>c</sup> another Don Juan, who died at seven years of age; but whether this be true or not, is scarce worth inquiry.

With regard to the character of this great prince, the Reasons reader will collect it from the facts that have been related. His own historians lift him too high; other writers have visibly laboured to diminish his reputation, and laboured to little purpose <sup>d</sup>. There are few monarchs of whom more falsities have been related, and this from his first entrance on the government to his resigning it; which many would make us believe was with a view to the papacy, a thing highly improbable, and absolutely inconsistent with other reports of his dying in protestant sentiments; which is not altogether unlikely, since the emperor was serious in his religious notions, and had conversed with divines who had embraced the Christian faith as set forth in the Scriptures, and who suffered for that faith <sup>e</sup>. It is also said, that he repented of his resignation, as we have hinted already; but as there is no act of his mentioned to prove it, it is far from deserving credit <sup>f</sup>. We have now conducted him from his retreat to

<sup>y</sup> BAYLE, SANDOVAL, FERRERAS.

RA, MAYERNE TURQUET.

of Austria in BAYLE.

berg in BAYLE.

<sup>c</sup> JACOBUS WILHELMUS IMHOFIUS, Notitia Germaniæ Procerum, p. 2. edit. Tubing. 1693.

<sup>d</sup> VARELLAS, MEZERAY.

<sup>e</sup> BRANTOME, Capit. Etrangers, tom. i. p. 36. THUANUS AUBIGNE.

<sup>f</sup> See the Preface to the French translation of the ninth volume of FERRERAS.

<sup>z</sup> LUIS CABRE-

<sup>a</sup> See the article of Don Juan

<sup>b</sup> See the article of Barbara Blom-

<sup>c</sup> JACOBUS WILHELMUS IMHOFIUS,

Notitia Germaniæ Procerum, p. 2. edit. Tubing. 1693.

<sup>d</sup> VARELLAS, MEZERAY.

<sup>e</sup> BRANTOME, Capit. Etrangers, tom. i. p. 36. THUANUS AUBIGNE.

<sup>f</sup> See the Preface to the French translation of the ninth volume of FERRERAS.

his tomb, and shall therefore proceed to the reign of his son Don Philip; having taken this method to render his history clear and connected in all its particulars, and to avoid breaking the thread of the ensuing narrative, by interspersing facts that would have been far less intelligible in that way than when the reader sees them, as he does here, all together.

S E C T. XV.

The History of the Reign of Don Philip II.

The first act of Philip's administration, the peace or truce with France.

1556.

THE first thing done by Don Philip after his accession to the dominions of Spain, by the resignation of his father, was to satisfy the queen of England, his consort, and his subjects in general, by concluding a peace, and, when that was found impracticable, a truce, with the crown of France for five years, which was published at Cambray on the 5th of February, between the emperor and the two kings of France and Spain; the news of which was very acceptable every-where, except at Rome <sup>a</sup>. Paul IV. persisted in his aversion to the house of Austria, and, to gratify his resentment, shewed very little care either for what he did, or what was said of his actions. His scheme was to deprive king Philip of the kingdom of Naples, to give it to a French prince, and, by the assistance of that crown, to make such other regulations in Italy, as might gratify his own inclinations, and the ambition of his family <sup>b</sup>. This truce, therefore, was very unwelcome to him, who was already in arms, and left the dominions of the church in a manner at the mercy of the duke of Alba, whom he endeavoured to amuse with propositions and treaties, but who was, of all men living, the least to be imposed upon by such artifices. In Spain, the nobility and people were inclined to carry on the war in Africa against the Moors, who, after taking from them Bugia, were disposed to strip them of the rest of their conquests; and it was to prevent this, that the Spaniards were for engaging in an offensive war, which Philip prevented, by sending them positive orders not to proceed therein till his arrival, which they very punctually obeyed <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> LUIS CARRERA Historia del Rey de España, Don Phelip II. fol. 1616. <sup>b</sup> RAINALD, FERRERAS. <sup>c</sup> CAN. HERRERA, LUYB DE MARMOL Description gen. de Africa, f. l. 1599. SALAZAR, FERRERAS.

THE pope, having sent his nephew cardinal Caraffa into France, engaged Henry the second to conclude a secret league against the Austrians, in which the Turk was to have a share, tho' that part of the scheme failed <sup>d</sup>. The duke of Guise, however, was sent with a potent army to protect the city of Rome from being sacked by the duke of Alba, as it had been by the duke of Bourbon; and, about the same time, the truce was violated by the admiral Coligny's attempting to surprise Doway, in which he failed <sup>e</sup>. Upon this king Philip found himself under a necessity of renewing the war; and, at his request, his consort queen Mary prevailed upon her subjects to take part in the quarrel against France. Accordingly a considerable body of troops was sent over, under the earl of Pembroke, to join the king's army, which, under Philibert duke of Savoy, and count Egmont, were employed in the Siege of St. Quintin in Picardy <sup>f</sup>. The French army, under the command of the constable and marshal St. André, marched towards St. Quintin, to cover a reinforcement they meant to throw into the place, which they effected; but, in their retreat, prince Philibert and the count of Egmont attacked and routed them intirely with great loss. This action happened on the 10th of August 8, dedicated by the church of Rome to the honour of St. Laurence the martyr; and, four days after, the place was taken by storm, the king having then joined the army, which struck the French with such consternation, that they immediately sent their fleet to Civita Vecchia, in order to bring over the duke of Guise's army from Italy; so that the pope, finding himself abandoned, was constrained to submit to such terms as the duke of Alba thought fit to prescribe, to receive him with great kindness and respect when he thought fit to make him a visit in Rome, and to dismiss him with his blessing <sup>h</sup>. This year died the cardinal archbishop of Toledo; upon which the king Don Philip advanced to that see father Bartolome de Carranza y Miranda, a Dominican frier, who was constrained to accept of it against his will, and who was afterwards very cruelly treated by the inquisition <sup>i</sup>.

Pope Paul IV. engages the French to violate that truce by gallantous promises.

1557.

<sup>d</sup> RAINALD, P. DANIEL, FERRERAS.      * FRANCISCI HAR-
 DEI Annales Ducum Brabantiz & utriusque Belgii, fol. 1623.
 C    MPANA, THUANUS, MEZERAY, FERRERAS.      <sup>f</sup> GOD-V    N'S Annals, FERRERAS.      * LAURENTII SURII Comm.
 I    um in Orbe gestarum, ab anno 1500 ad annum 1566. 8vo.
 I    6.      <sup>h</sup> RAINALD, ILLESCAS, FERRERAS.      <sup>i</sup> DIZCO DE C    STEJON Y FONSECA Primatia de la Santa Iglesia de Toledo,
 I    1625.

The French beat at Gravelines by the assistance of the queen of England's fleet.

1558.

Peace concluded by Philip at Chateau Cambresis, in which the empire and England are abandoned.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the duke of Guise, having surprised some of the adjacent fortresses, pursued the advantage he gained so well as to make himself master of Calais, and all its dependencies, by which the English being intirely driven out of France, a deep sense of the loss and disgrace so affected queen Mary, that it brought her to the grave <sup>k</sup>. The same duke, in the spring, attacked the strong fortress of Thionville, of which he made himself master: soon after which the marshal duke de Termes marched with a great body of forces from Calais, and, after sacking Dunkirk, advanced to Gravelines, where being attacked in front by the Spanish and Flemish horse, commanded by count Egmont, and taken in flank by the artillery of the English fleet; he was thoroughly beaten, and taken prisoner, with the loss of almost all the army that he commanded. In Italy <sup>l</sup>, the duke of Alba being recalled, that his severity might not lose those countries, which by his great military skill had been defended, the Turkish fleet, under the command of the basha Piala, consisting of one hundred and thirty gallies, came in the month of June, and insulted the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and, having done what mischief they could, proceeded to Corfica, to join the French, who treated them that year as they had been treated by them the year before <sup>m</sup>. They sailed from thence to Minorca, where they took and plundered Port Mahon, and then, with a large booty and many slaves on board, returned to Constantinople. The French army under monsieur de la Motte gained some advantages in the beginning of the summer, but were afterwards beaten; and, about the approach of winter, the two crowns, being equally weary of the war, consented to a negotiation, and a suspension of arms, in order to the conclusion of a stable and solid peace <sup>n</sup>.

In the beginning of the year the peace was concluded at Chateau Cambresis, in which it was stipulated, that his catholic majesty should marry the princess Elizabeth of France, who, in the life-time of Mary of England, had been thought of for his son the prince Don Carlos. Madame Margaret, the French king's sister, was to marry the duke of Savoy, in consideration of which the French were to restore to him all his dominions. Corfica was to return to the Genoese; the Spaniards quitted all claim to Burgundy; and the French to des Pays-Bas. depuis 1515 jusqu'en 1612, fol. 1618.

<sup>k</sup> GODWIN'S ANNALS.
PANA. <sup>n</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>l</sup> EMANUEL METEREN Histoire
<sup>m</sup> CAM-

the Milanese and the kingdom of Naples. In this treaty Philip did not take proper care of his allies; for the empire lost Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and the English Calais; though, to save appearances, it was stipulated that the French should render it in eight years, if Q. Elizabeth did not furnish them within that time with a pretence to keep it °. The duke of Alba was sent to Paris, to espouse the princess Elizabeth for the king; and the duke of Savoy went thither to wed the princess Margaret himself. The rejoicings for these marriages, and for the peace, were interrupted by the fatal accident of the French king's death, by a splinter of a lance that struck him in the eye; which, however, had no influence on the treaty or the marriages P. King Philip hastened his return to Spain, and left his sister Margaret, princess of Parma, governess of the Low Countries, keeping her son prince Alexander Farnese at Madrid by way of hostage, under colour of providing for his education. The king embarked in Zealand on the 20th of August, and arrived in Biscay on the twenty-ninth 1. He held soon after an assembly of the states of Castile at Toledo, where, according to the desire of his father, he acknowledged Don Juan of Austria for his brother; and is said to have wept when he first saw him, because of the strong resemblance he had to the emperor 2. On the 4th of October the king was present at an act of faith, and, which is singular enough, he is highly commended by the Spanish historians for his want of humanity, and for his attributing to the gospel of peace, cruelties that would have made Mohammedans tremble. But the inquisition were resolved to tear up what they stiled heresy by the roots; and, having persuaded the king to consider this as a point of state, they proceeded without mercy, and he, who should have protected, was present, and looked on the slaughter of his subjects with pleasure 3.

THE princess Elizabeth of France, being conducted to the The duke frontiers of that kingdom by the cardinal of Bourbon and the de Medi- duke of Vendosme, was received there by the cardinal arch- na Celi, bishop of Burgos and the duke of Infantada, who conducted with the her to Toledo, where the marriage was celebrated with great Spanish pomp on the 2d of February 4. In the assembly of the states fleet, beat held soon after, the prince Don Carlos was acknowledged suc- by the cessor, and sworn to by all who were present 5. The knights Turks.

° Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. v. parti. p. 34.

1 HERRERA.

2 CABRERA.

3 EMANUEL METEREN.

4 SALAZAR DE MENDOZA.

5 TRUVA-

NUS.

6 HERRERA.

of Malta having solicited the king very earnestly to recover Tripoli out of the hands of the infidels, the command of that expedition was committed to the duke of Medina Celi, viceroy of the Sicilies, who assembled for that purpose a numerous army and a strong fleet. He was assisted also by Doria, by the pope, and other princes and states of Italy, and was very successful at the beginning, making himself 1560. master of the island of Gerbes. While he remained there with his fleet, he was surprised by the basha Piali, with the whole force of the Ottoman empire under his command, which threw the Christians into such a panic, that they might with greater propriety be said to be destroyed than defeated. The duke himself escaped with great difficulty; his son, with several other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners, together with twenty gallies, and at least as many were sunk, with all who were on board them. Soon after the fortress and island of Gerbes were likewise reduced <sup>w</sup>. The king Don Philip was extremely affected by this misfortune, and immediately demanded from the new pope, Pius the fourth, the necessary powers for raising money on the clergy. Antony of Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, endeavoured to engage the pope to procure from his catholic majesty the restitution of the kingdom of Navarre, which he claimed in right of the family of Albret, but without effect; tho' it is said Philip was not extremely well satisfied with his own title to that kingdom <sup>x</sup>. The city of Toledo appearing to the king less convenient for the residence of his court than that of Madrid, he removed thither this year, and began to lay out those improvements which have since rendered it the capital of Spain <sup>y</sup>. The persecution against the protestants was still carried on with unrelenting severity, and, on the 22d of December, there was an act of faith held at Seville, in which some were put to death, and many were condemned to grievous punishments, of which perpetual imprisonment was amongst the mildest <sup>z</sup>.

Don Car- los prince
of Spain
in great

THE king, sensible of that insolence which prosperity always inspires, more especially amongst the Turks, gave orders for building gallies in all the ports on the coasts of Catalonia, Valentia, Naples, and Sicily, and directed such precautions to be taken for the protection of all the maritime parts <sup>danger of</sup> of his dominions as preserved them from any insult. The <sup>death from</sup> jealousies and heart-burnings, that afterwards produced such <sup>a fall</sup> terrible consequences in the Low Countries, began about this <sup>down</sup> time, not through any fault in the duchess of Parma, but <sup>stairs.</sup> from the rigour and haughtiness of the bishop of Mechlin, 1561.

<sup>w</sup> GIACOMO BOSIO Hist. dell' Origine de San Giovanni Gierosolimitana, fol. 1594. <sup>x</sup> RAINALD. <sup>y</sup> CEPEDA.

<sup>z</sup> Annales Ecclesiasticos y Seglares de la Ciudad de Seville desde el año 1246, en que fue conquistada del Poder de los Moros, hasta el de 1671, por Don Diego Ortiz de Zuniga, fol. Madrid 1677.

 so well known to the world by the title he acquired next year of cardinal Granvelle <sup>a</sup>. The great danger that Spain was in of being attacked by the infidels, and the repeated intelligence which the court received that the Morescoes in the kingdom of Granada held secret correspondence with the Moors in Barbary, induced the king to cause them all to be disarmed; which was done with great dexterity and address, but at the same time it so terrified those poor people, that it has been thought the most probable cause of their subsequent insurrection; from whence it appeared of how much greater consequence it would have been to have left their arms, and by good treatment have taken away their disaffection <sup>b</sup>. The Moors threatening Oran with a siege, the king ordered Don Juan de Mendoza to sail from Malaga with a squadron of twenty-four gallies, with a body of troops on board, for that fortress; but they met with such a storm at sea, that twenty-two gallies, four thousand men, and amongst them the general himself, and several other persons of quality, were lost <sup>c</sup>. The emperor Ferdinand, making peace about this time with the grand signior, obtained the liberty of the Spanish noblemen, who were made prisoners in the fight at sea before-mentioned, except Don Gaston de la Cerda, son to the duke of Medina Celi, who died at Constantinople <sup>d</sup>. This year an accident befell the prince Don Carlos, which was very near being fatal to him. The king had sent him, together with his brother Don Juan of Austria, and his nephew prince Alexander of Farnese, to the university of Alcala de Henares, to pursue their studies. The prince, who was then about seventeen, and very sprightly and active, unluckily tumbled down stairs, by which he received such a blow on the head, that for some time he scarce gave any signs of life, but by degrees came to himself, and continued for some days tolerably well, when on a sudden he was attacked by a fever, attended with such violent symptoms, that the physicians acquainted the king that his life was in the utmost danger, who thereupon immediately repaired to Alcala, where 1562.

<sup>a</sup> CABRERA.
 Historia de la Rebellion y Castigo de los Moriscos del Reyno de Granada, por Luys de Marmol Carvajal, fol. 1600.

<sup>b</sup> Historia de la Rebellion y Castigo de los Moriscos del Reyno de Granada, por Luys de Marmol Carvajal, fol. 1600.
<sup>c</sup> FERRERAS.
<sup>d</sup> SALAZAR, MARMOL.

he shewed the utmost tenderness and concern for the prince, who is said to have recovered, when at the very point of death, by laying his hand upon the head of a dead monk, afterwards highly revered in Spain by the name of St. Diego <sup>c</sup>.

The king builds the stately and splendid edifice of the Escorial.

IN the spring of the ensuing year, the king Don Philip, after having maturely considered the plan offered him by Juan Baptista de Toledo, for building a most magnificent edifice, or rather a group of elegant and magnificent structures, made choice of a great extent of rough, barren, and heathy country, at a small distance from the village of Escorial, which lies about seven leagues from Madrid, where the first stone of the monastery was laid with great solemnity on the 23d of April; and, on the 20th of August following, the first stone of the church was likewise laid with equal solemnity, and dedicated to the honour of the holy martyr St. Laurence, who is said to have been broiled alive at Rome in the third century <sup>f</sup>. The best Spanish authors say, that in this the king executed the will of his father, who was very desirous of erecting a monastery for the burial-place of himself and his family, worthy of those vast dominions over which they ruled while living; and, as a proof of this, they allege the placing Geronymites in the monastery; but at the same time it is agreed, that the dedication of the church, and indeed the whole form of the structure, which is that of a grid-iron, is to be referred to the victory of St. Quintin, which was gained upon the feast of St. Laurence <sup>g</sup>. In the spring, the project of Hassan, the son of Barbarossa king of Algiers, for the recovery of Oran and Mazalquivir out of the hands of the Spaniards, began to discover itself. He had formerly treated with his catholic majesty, of which, as they had some suspicion at Constantinople, he framed this design to recover his credit, and employed in it the whole force of the infidels in Africa, as well as a great naval armament, which was furnished by the grand signior.

Hassan king of Algiers besieges the fortresses of Oran and Mazalquivir.

ABOUT the middle of March he took the field with a numerous army, invested both fortresses, and so stationed his squadrons, that they could obtain little or no relief by sea. The count de Alcantete commanded in Oran, and his brother Don Martin de Cordova in Mazalquivir, who having an intimate affection for, and perfect confidence in, each other, made all the necessary dispositions for a long and gallant defence, for which, by their having very numerous garrisons, they were the better enabled. As there were many strong forts and outworks detached from the body of both places, the two brothers took care to put these in the best state of defence possible, because they might be defended with a small force, and their garrisons frequently changed. This had a good effect; for tho', in Oran and Mazalquivir, the allowance of provisions was very sparing, yet, in the forts, the soldiers were allowed to fare well; and when they were either wounded or fatigued beyond measure, the garrison was changed. By these methods the Turks suffered extremely, and paid very dear for every yard of ground they gained; but at length they came to attack Mazalquivir by sea, and notwithstanding they were repulsed in several general assaults, as they persisted obstinately in the pursuit of their point, the place had been probably taken, if the Christian fleet had not arrived, under the command of Don Francisco de Mendoza, upon which king Hassan was obliged to retire, after a fruitless siege of three months. The king immediately declared the count de Alcantete viceroy of Navarre, and gave his brother Don Martin de Cordova, and all the officers who commanded under them, particular marks of his favour<sup>b</sup>. This war engaged the king to cause the *Moor*s of Valentia to be disarmed, which was done throughout that kingdom in a single hour, and six thousand sabres, that were taken from them, sent to the militia in the island of Sardinia<sup>i</sup>. The king made a tour in the winter to Saragossa, where he was treated with great splendor and magnificence; however, being informed that great acts of injustice were committed by magistrates, and other persons in power, upon the lower sort of people, he caused many to be put to death, and their estates being confiscated, he made full restitution out of them to all who had been injured. He went from thence to Monçon, where he held the states of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, where he obtained very liberal supplies, and immediately issued his orders for assembling a very numerous fleet in the spring, as well as for finishing all the gallies upon the stocks<sup>k</sup>. The king, still neglecting to recall cardinal Granvelle, the troubles in the Low Countries daily increased. The council of Trent being closed this year, the Spanish prelates and divines, who had assisted there, returned home<sup>l</sup>, and 1563.

<sup>c</sup> FRANCOIS DE PENA dans le Vie de St. Diegue, liv. ii.

<sup>f</sup> Historia de la Orden de San Geronimo, por FRAY JOSEPH DE SIGUENCA de la misma Orden, fol. 1613. <sup>g</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>b</sup> PIERRE DE SALAZAR.
de la Ciudad y Reyno de Valentia.
REAS.

<sup>i</sup> GASPAR ESCOLANO Hist.
<sup>k</sup> CABREKA. <sup>l</sup> FER-

the king, who had been the principal support of that council, received them with much respect.

Don Gar-cias de Toledo
attacks
and reduces the castle of Penon'de
Velez.

As the king had been informed that some of his subjects in America were apprehensive that they might some time or other be divided from Castile, he caused a solemn instrument to be drawn up, by which all the countries the Spaniards possessed, or which might be conquered by them, in that part of the world, were irrevocably annexed to that crown; for the due performance of which he, for himself, his heirs and successors, pledged his royal faith to them and their posterity; which act was transmitted thither for their satisfaction <sup>m</sup>. As the succession depended at this time solely on the life of the prince Don Carlos, the king sent for his nephews the archdukes Rodolph and Ernest, the sons of Maximilian king of the Romans, who soon after became emperor, and received them with great kindness and affection. The vast preparations that had been made, as well in Italy as in Spain, for assembling a great naval power, were in some measure relaxed, upon the king's having certain intelligence that the Turks had laid aside their design of sending their fleet into the Mediterranean; but, however, as the expence had been very great, as many gallies were assembled at Carthage, and as the squadrons of Portugal and Malta were arrived, it was determined to employ them. The king judged no expedition so proper for that purpose as the reduction of Penon de Velez, a fortress which the Moors had recovered out of the hands of the Christians, and under the cannon of which their corsairs took protection whenever they were chased by the gallies of Spain. There had been an attempt made upon the place the year before, but without effect, chiefly through a misunderstanding amongst the general officers employed in that service. The command was now given to Don Garcia Toledo, viceroy of Sicily, who, with a numerous army and a potent fleet, sailed in order to execute his master's orders. Notwithstanding the place was very strong from situation, as well as the effects of art, covered by several good forts, and defended by a numerous garrison, it was, after a very gallant defence, abandoned by the infidels, and, the Spanish troops taking possession of it, was fortified in a better manner, and rendered much stronger, than before <sup>n</sup>. The king ordered the decrees of the council of 1564.

<sup>m</sup> CAMPANA.

<sup>n</sup> MAMBRINO Rosso Compendio della Storia dal Regno di Napoli, parte secunda, che seguita la parte prima del Collenuccio, con le Annotazioni di Tomaso Costo, e vol Libro settimo di Colonello Pacca, 4to, 1613.

Trent to be published, enforced; and obeyed, throughout all his dominions. It was this that determined the inhabitants of the Low Countries to defend liberty of conscience by the sword, and to prevent the introduction of the Inquisition amongst them; and they began to dispose every thing for throwing off the yoke of Spain, notwithstanding the king had at length, to comply with their desires, made use of an honourable pretence to remove cardinal Granvelle; a condescension that, two years before, might have restored the public tranquillity °, but was then considered as a testimony that the king saw he had been in the wrong.

THE corsairs of Barbary, notwithstanding their loss at Pe- Interview non de Velez, continued still to disturb the commerce, and to at Bay- make frequent descents upon the coast of Spain, which it was onne be- impossible for the king's squadrons to prevent, as they com- tween the mitted these depredations in light ships, and by surprise. queen of However, the king recollecting the advice given him by Don Spain, Garcia de Toledo, resolved to send a squadron, with a certain her mo- number of vessels filled with stone and bitumen, to block up ther, and spoil the mouth of the river of Tetuan, to which these brother. pirates commonly resorted. This measure, as it was wisely contrived, was very happily executed, to the great satisfaction of the king and benefit of his subjects. But it was not long before both he and they were alarmed with certain intelligence that the Turks were arming with incredible diligence, and that they would speedily put to sea a greater fleet than any that had yet appeared. On this, proper precautions were taken for the security of the Spanish coasts, more especially those of Catalonia and Valentia, for the protection of Majorca, Sardinia, and Corfica, for putting Sicily and Naples in a proper condition of defence, and for assembling the gallees of Genoa, Tuscany, and the other Italian states, to be employed as occasion might require †. The French monarch Charles IX. and his mother, having demanded an interview with his catholic majesty at Bayonne, he excused himself, and sent the queen Donna Isabella to confer with her mother and brother, attended by the duke of Alba, and some other persons of great quality; and in these conferences, which lasted about three weeks, it is said that various resolutions were taken for extinguishing heresy, or, to speak with greater propriety, for the extirpation of those whom they stiled heretics ‡. The king likewise caused several pro-

° ANTONIO CARNERO Historia de las Guerras Civiles que ha auido en los Estados de Flandres, fol. 1625. P. CABRERA.

† DUPLEIX, THUANUS.

1565. vincial councils to be held in his dominions, in which the decrees of the assembly of Trent were received; and tho' one would have imagined this must have been very acceptable at Rome, yet it happened quite otherwise; for Pius IV. observing that all this was done by virtue of the royal prerogative, and without so much as mentioning his holiness's name, he was extremely offended at it.

The grand signior causes the island of Malta to be invaded by Sinan
basha.

IN the mean time, certain advice was received, that this prodigious armament of the Turks was intended against Malta, which induced the grand master Jean de Valette to demand the assistance of all the Christian powers. Don Garcia de Toledo, viceroy of Sicily, went thither immediately with a squadron of twenty-eight gallies, in order to give the best advice and assistance in his power. He found all things in a much better state than he expected, and the grand master at the head of five hundred knights, and four thousand regular troops besides, exclusive of two thousand five hundred domestics, capable of bearing arms. He left with him his natural son Don Frederic, with a hundred Spanish volunteers; and having furnished him with ammunition and provisions, and promised him all the succours in his power, he returned to Sicily towards the end of April. On the 18th of May, the Turkish fleet, commanded by Piali basha, consisting of upwards of three hundred sail, appeared in sight, and debarked soon after an army of forty-five thousand men, under the command of Mustapha basha. As the Turkish generals are almost always responsible for the success of the expeditions in which they are employed, they pushed their military operations with prodigious obstinacy, notwithstanding the great and continual losses they sustained, which, however, were as regularly supplied by continual reinforcements. While things were in this situation, a vast naval force was assembled in Sicily, where, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations of the grand master, the viceroy Don Garcia delayed their departure, which occasioned much discontent in John Andrew Doria, and other principal officers; but the viceroy considered, that, if the expedition miscarried, it must be fatal to Malta, and might be so to Naples and Sicily. At length, however, taking his measures from his own intelligence, he sailed with a fleet of seventy gallies, and, on the 6th of September, landed 12,000 Spanish and Italian foot without any interruption, and returned safe with his fleet to Sicily.

† GONZALES DE ILLESCAS Historia Pontifical. RAINALD, FERRERAS.

THE

THE Turks, as soon as they knew that the succours were landed, raised the siege, embarked their artillery, and would have put their troops on board, but that Piali basha persuaded Mustapha to attack the Christians in their camp, which he did, and was very soundly beat; upon which he retired to the fleet, and the Turks quitted the island with much precipitation *. The viceroy of Sicily returned with his fleet, and pursued them, but with no great effect; after which he reimarked the forces, and carried them back to Sicily. This war produced some very singular consequences in Spain, where Don Juan of Austria made his escape from court, with a sincere intention of going to Malta, to signalize himself against the infidels; but, over-heating himself in his journey, fell sick of a fever in Arragon, where he received the king's orders to return, which he was forced to obey †. The prince Don Carlos was inclined to take the same step, but in appearance only; for, in reality, he meant to go to Flanders, being upon bad terms with his father. By a strange infatuation, the person he trusted was Ruy Gomez de Silva, the king's favourite, who cheated him with a false letter from the viceroy of Naples, importing that Malta was relieved; upon which he laid aside his journey, and then, as is generally supposed, revealed it to his father ‡. This year prince Alexander Farnese was sent by the king to his mother in Flanders, after procuring for him Donna Maria, the daughter of the infant Don Edward of Portugal, in marriage; and Don Antonio, who afterwards took the title of king of Portugal, being at this time upon bad terms with the regency, retired to Madrid, and was kindly received by king Philip w. |

TOWARDS the close of the preceding year, pope Pius the fourth, had sent a cardinal, with the title of his legate, accompanied by two commissaries, to inquire into the reasons which had induced the inquisition to seize and imprison the archbishop of Toledo; but the death of the pope obliged the cardinal legate to return, and put an end to the commission. The king was in hopes that the cardinal of Alexandria, who, upon his accession to the papal throne, assumed the name of Pius V. might have been prevailed upon to act in a different manner from his predecessor; but it proved otherwise; for he not only renewed the commission, but likewise ordered that the archbishop should be sent to Rome, with all the original pieces that regarded his process, which the inquisition at first endeavoured to avoid, but with which at length they were obliged to comply <sup>x</sup>. King Philip's intelligence, tho' it was generally pretty good, failed him this year, in regard to the motions of the Turks, who, he was brought to believe, would employ their whole strength in a land-war against Hungary. This kingdom they attacked indeed with a numerous army, but at the same time they dispatched Piali basha, with a strong fleet, to plunder the coast of Naples, which he performed so effectually, that, after loading his gallies as deep as they would swim with booty and slaves, he was constrained to leave much that he had taken behind, having intelligence that Don Garcia de Toledo was at sea with a fleet to attack him <sup>y</sup>. His catholic majesty, at the solicitation of the grand master, resolved to be at the expence of building a new fortress to cover the capital of that island; and having sent an engineer, with a sufficient number of workmen for that purpose, agreed to furnish the value of ten thousand ducats in military stores, provisions to the same value; and the like sum in ready money annually, till it should be completely finished <sup>z</sup>. On the 11th of August the queen Donna Isabella was delivered of a daughter, who was baptized by the pope's nuncio, and had the name given her of Isabella Clara Eugenia, of whom we shall have occasion hereafter to speak frequently <sup>a</sup>. The prince Don Carlos was one of the sponsors at this ceremony, though the king had discovered his intrigues with Mr. Montigny, one of the deputies from the malecontents in the Low Countries, by whom he was solicited to go thither; for which that unfortunate gentleman was sent prisoner to the castle of Segovia, and, upon his attempting to make his escape from thence, was transferred to Medina del Campo, where, with some of his friends, who had accompanied him to Spain, he lost his life upon a scaffold. Not long after, a resolution was taken to send the duke of Alba to support the inquisition, and compel the Flemings to remain good catholics by a military force, tho' some of the council advised that the king should go thither in person; and perhaps his affairs would have taken a better turn, if he had yielded to this advice <sup>b</sup>.

Intrigues of Don Carlos with the malecontents in the Low Countries discovered.

* GIACOMO BOSIO. † LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN Y LEON Historia del Don Juan de Austria, 4to, 1627. ‡ CA-BRERA. w FARIA Y SOUSA.

The arch- Don Pedro Guerrero; archbishop of Granada, having made bishop of a tour to Rome, to visit the new pope, acquainted him with Granada the strong suspicions he had that the Morescoes in his diocese

<sup>x</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>y</sup> MAMBRINO ROSEQ.

<sup>z</sup> GIACOMO

BOSIO.

<sup>a</sup> DIEGO DE COLMENARES Historia de la Ciudad de Segovia, fol. 1637.

<sup>b</sup> FERRERAS.

were few or none of them Christians in their hearts; that, <sup>stirs up a</sup> though they were baptized, he was informed they afterwards <sup>persecution</sup> washed their children's faces with hot water, as a token of <sup>against the</sup> their intention to efface that sacrament; that, after they were <sup>Mores-</sup> married according to their usual form in the churches, they <sup>coes.</sup> espoused their wives privately at home after the manner of the Moors; that they pursued the same conduct in other respects, received privately their countrymen from Africa, gave them intelligence prejudicial to the Christians, and frequently stole their neighbours children, whom they sold to these corsairs, who carried them into Barbary, circumcised, and brought them up Mohammedans, with much more to the same purpose; upon which informations, the zealous pope wrote in very strong terms to king Philip, to stir him up against these poor people, and to raise a new flame about religion in Spain, at a time when he was already sufficiently embarrassed by pursuing this conduct in the Low Countries. If this conduct was strange in the pope, it was still stranger in the king, who took his advice, and sent express orders into the kingdom of Granada to oblige the Morescoes to change their habit, their manners, and their language, all at once. Mondejar, who was captain-general of that province, and others of his principal officers, remonstrated strongly in favour of those poor people, and declared their unwillingness to attempt the execution of a scheme equally unreasonable and impracticable, which looked as if they had a design to drive them first into despair, and then into rebellion. The Moors themselves also, by their deputies, represented with great humility the sad situation they were in; and with much modesty, but by clear and strong arguments, as the best Spanish historians admit, refuted the principal points of accusation that had been urged against them. But it was to little or no effect, except procuring a small respite; for the king gave express orders, even to those who had most strongly opposed this measure, to take their instructions from the resident Spinafa, a man who, in point of inflexibility, did not yield at all to the duke of Alba himself; and we shall quickly see what this produced.

THE king ordered a fleet to be assembled at Corunna, and Duke of it was certainly given out, at least if not intended, that he Alba goes would go in person to the Low Countries. An author of into the great reputation <sup>d</sup> assures us, that permission was asked from Low Charles IX. to debark the Spanish troops at Frejus, and so to Coun- march them by land into Burgundy; but the king found a tries, and civil

<sup>c</sup> LUYE DE MARMOL, CARVAJAL.

<sup>d</sup> THUANUS.

the princess Margaret resigns the government.

1567.

civil pretence for declining what it was not either his interest or his inclination to grant. When the duke of Alba came to take his leave of the prince Don Carlos, in order to go to Flanders, the young man threw himself into a violent passion, told him he meant to go thither himself; that the army should have no other chief; and that he should not presume to go thither on pain of his high displeasure. The duke of Alba answered with great respect, that, at this time, those countries were in the utmost confusion; that he went to settle tranquillity; that the prince would bestow that time in preserving a life infinitely precious to Spain; and that when all troubles were composed, he might visit the Low Countries without danger, and be the distributor of those favours which his father might think fit to bestow on such as he desired either to reward or to reclaim. He added, that, at all events, it was his own duty to obey the king's orders, which he hoped his highness would not take amiss. The prince immediately drew his dagger in great passion, and would have killed him; but the duke seized him by the arms, cried out for help, and, as soon as some of the courtiers entered, withdrew, and informed the king of this strange event, which, without question, gave him great displeasure<sup>c</sup>. The duke of Alba landing at Nice, passed into Lombardy, and put himself at the head of the Spanish army, which, though not very numerous, was composed of such good troops, and the duke's military reputation was then at such a height, that some of the greatest powers in Europe were alarmed. The Swiss were apprehensive, that, in compliment to the pope, the duke would have taken Geneva in his passage; and therefore they thought fit to arm by way of precaution. The protestants in France had their fears; but the duke executed his commission punctually, and, having conducted the army into the county of Burgundy, proceeded from thence into Flanders, where having caused the counts of Egmont and Horn to be arrested as they came from council, he directed a citadel to be built at Antwerp. As he paid little or no regard to the princess Margaret, she very prudently resigned the title of governess, and retired into Italy, leaving the duke to reap all the fruits and all the glory of his own measures<sup>f</sup>. Measures which had one good effect, that they served to establish the Dutch republic.

<sup>c</sup> CABRERA, FERRERAS.
H. R. F. FAMIANI STRADÆ de Bello Belgico. METERN, FERRERAS.

<sup>f</sup> HERRERA, CABRERA,
H. R. F. FAMIANI STRADÆ de Bello Belgico. METERN,
FERRERAS.

THE unfortunate prince Don Carlos of Spain seemed to be The prince intent upon accomplishing his own undoing. He had the Don Car- misfortune to be deformed in his person, and to have a los forms weakness in one of his legs; circumstances which occasioned a design of more than ordinary indulgence to be shewn him in his in- quitting fancy; and this, if it did not excite, at least strengthened, his fa- bad habits. He was hasty and passionate, and, which rarely ther's happens in the same person, he was obstinate and fullen, court, and very apt to take offence, and implacable in his aversions; flying into Ger- which very probably was the occasion of his distractions; many. for as he did not conceal his resentment, so some of the greatest persons about the court were the objects of it, and therefore little inclined to conceal or to excuse his errors. The president Spinoza, Don Ruy Gomez, prince of Eboli, and the king's favourite, were of this number; and Don Garcia Toledo, his governor, who had a sincere affection for him, taking the liberty, as they were riding together in a wood, to expostulate with him upon his ill conduct, the prince suddenly attempted to kill him; upon which he immediately set spurs to his horse, and fled to Madrid<sup>s</sup>. The prince was desirous of marrying his cousin the archduchess Anne of Austria, which was likewise very acceptable to the emperor; but as the king made no great haste in the negotiation, he conceived in his own mind that the king thought him unfit to be married, and incapable of the succession; upon this he took a resolution of flying into Germany, and wrote letters to most of the nobility, desiring their assistance in a certain great affair; which they promised him, provided it was not against his father, and furnished him with a very large sum of money. He then broke the matter to Don John of Austria, and pressed him to concur in it; but he told him he had put it out of his power; that some of the nobility would acquaint the king, and therefore it was better in him to drop the thing itself<sup>h</sup>.

BUT he persisted; upon which his confessor forlook him. On which The admiral, and some other lords, having brought his let- the king ters to the king, and his majesty being likewise informed that goes in the master of the posts had received the prince's orders to person to furnish horses for a long journey, he resolved to arrest him; his apart- and, for this purpose, went the same day, which was the ment, and 18th of January, to Madrid. About midnight he entered his causes him son's apartment in the palace, attended by Ruy Gomez de to be ar- Silva, Don Juan Manrique de Lara, Don Antonio de Toledo, rested. the prior of St. John, and Lewis Quixada, the duke of Feria following with some of the guards. The prince, as soon as he saw him, shrunk under the bed-cloaths, crying out, Will your majesty kill me? I am not mad, but am rendered desperate by the manner in which your majesty treats me. The king bid him make himself easy, and be assured that he meant every thing for his good. The king seized all the arms that were in the room, together with his papers, and a strong box. He then appointed six noblemen of the first families in Spain to wait upon the prince, with express orders that two of them should have him constantly in their sight; and that they should permit him to have nothing in his reach by which he might endanger his own life<sup>i</sup>. The king immediately gave notice to the pope's nuncio, and to all the foreign ministers, of the motives which led him to treat the prince in this manner. He did the same to all the great towns by a letter, which is still extant in more volumes than one<sup>k</sup>. Their imperial majesties interposed with great earnestness and anxiety in favour of the prince; but the king assured them, that he had taken the advice of civilians and divines before he proceeded so far; and that they might be assured he would act with caution and tenderness for the future<sup>l</sup>.

<sup>s</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>h</sup> HERRERA.

He dies under that confinement in the space of a few months.

Don Carlos, however, bore his confinement with great impatience. He refused all nourishment for two whole days, of which the king being informed, he went to his apartment, and staid till he had taken some refreshment. He afterwards eat with great avidity, and overcharged his stomach. When the weather became hot, he drank to excess of ice dissolved to water, by which he weakened the tone of his stomach to such a degree that it would bear nothing. His physicians, seeing the danger he was in, advised him to prepare for death; which he did with great piety and calmness, being assisted by his confessor and other divines. He desired earnestly to see his father, who went to him immediately, and gave him his blessing. The prince begged his pardon, and desired that he would provide for his servants. The king asked him what he would have done for them, and, when he told him, promised to do all that he had asked. In a short time after the king withdrew, he expired, on the 24th of June, in the 24th year of his age<sup>m</sup>. Such was the end of this unhappy prince, according to the best Spanish historians; but other writers have taken great freedom upon this subject, and have, without scruple, asserted that he was put

<sup>i</sup> CABRERA.
RAS.

<sup>k</sup> DIEGO DE COLMENARES.
<sup>m</sup> CABRERA, CAMPANA.

<sup>l</sup> FERRE-

to death by his father's command<sup>n</sup>. If this be true, it is inexcusable; if it be not true, the king was doubly unfortunate in the loss of his son and of his reputation, of which few princes were so tender. He caused the whole court to go into mourning, and buried him publicly with great splendor<sup>o</sup> (A).

THE

<sup>o</sup> Hist. de France, par PIERRE MATTHIEU. <sup>o</sup> CABRERA; CAMPANA.

(A) The prevailing opinion, as to the violent death of the prince Don Carlos, has proceeded chiefly from the confidence with which it was reported by French historians; one of them has given a long account of the king's proceedings against him before the inquisition, the issue of which was his being sentenced to death; but he was to be allowed to chuse what death he pleased; which having refused, four slaves came into his chamber in a morning, where two held his arms, one his legs, and the other strangled him with a silken cord. The same writer agrees that many were of opinion he was bled to death in a warm bath (1). Turquet, in his history of Spain, discusses the point largely, and at length asserts, that the inquisitors persuaded the king, that he might lawfully put to death the prince his son, the queen his wife, and the prince with whom she was supposed to be with child, tho' it proved a princess. After all, he leaves it doubtful whether the prince was poisoned, or strangled by slaves. According to this writer, Don Carlos was impotent, and the unfortunate queen fell a sacrifice to the king's jealousy, not of the prince, but of the marquis de Poza (2). Monsieur St. Evremont indulges a very unbecoming pleasantry upon this melancholy subject. He says, the Spaniard, who strangled Don Carlos, cried out while he was doing it, Calla, calla, Senor, todo que se baste es por su bien; that is, Hold your tongue, hold your tongue, Sir; all that is done is for your good (3); which seems to be a wilful mistake of what the king said when he seized him; for at the breaking open of the door, the prince cried out, What brings your majesty here? Is it to kill me? To which the king answered, No, my son; it is for your good. Be not impatient (4). Wiser and more impartial writers of that nation confess that those stories have been transmitted to posterity, odio magis quam ex fide, rather to indulge spleen than vindicate the truth (5). But let us hear strangers well informed, and whose integrity will admit of no suspicion. A Polish bishop and senator, who had his information from the Polish mi-

(1) Pierre Matthieu Hist. de France. p. 1507—1406.

(2) Hist. d'Espagne, liv. xxix.

(3) Oeuvres de St. Evremont.

(4) Luis Cabrera

Hist. del Rey d'España, Don Phelipe II.

(5) Mémoires Historiques, Politiques, Critiques, & Littéraires, par Amelot de la Houffaye, tom. i. p. 205.

Revolt of the Mo-
rescoes in Granada
followed by a long and bloody civil war.

THE marquis de Mondejar, finding all his representations ineffectual, left the publication of the king's injunctions to his son the count de Tendilla; and they were accordingly published about the beginning of the year P. The archbishop also enjoined the clergy in their respective parishes to require the Morescoes to register all their children from the age of five to fifteen, in order to be taught the Castilian tongue, and to be thoroughly instructed in the Christian religion. This manner of proceeding determined them at once to revolt; which resolution, tho' suddenly taken, was pursued with great slowness and secrecy, and was managed intirely by Farax Aben Farax, and some others of their chiefs. The first thing they did was to send into the mountainous country of Alpujarros, where their strength lay; and finding that there were eighty-five thousand Moorish families, that they could with ease bring fifty thousand able men into the field, they conceived the recovery of Granada a thing very practicable, if the scheme was rightly conducted. They sent an agent to Algiers, without being suspected, and they contrived a very singular method of introducing their deputies to sound the minds of the people in all parts of the kingdom,

P DIEGO DE MENDOZA.

niser, then in the court of Philip II. says, that the king, going from Valladolid, turned out of the road to go and make a visit to his son at Madrid, out of paternal affection, and found him giving up the ghost; but he leaves it doubtful whether he died of poison or of grief (6). Morofini, the Venetian senator, who was permitted to inspect the dispatches of their minister to the republic, assures us, that Don Carlos, not being able to find a sword or dagger, the king left him no weapons, and suffered none to go near him armed, with which he might dispatch himself, took the diamond secretly out of his ring, and swallowed it; but finding this did him no hurt, weary of life, and ashamed of his imprisonment, he eat voraciously of all that was brought before him, and swallowed afterwards great quantities of cold water, which brought on a dysentery, that killed him; but that he first received all the sacraments of the church, with his father's forgiveness and blessing (7). This agrees perfectly well with what we have related in the text from a Spanish historian, and, in a matter of so dark and perplexed a nature, may, as the astronomers speak, without any sensible error, pass for truth (8).

(6) Pauli Piafecii Chronica, A. D. 1568. della Citta e Republica di Venetia. d'Espagne, Don Philippe II.

(7) Pauli Morofini Historia
(8) Luis Cabrera Historia del Rey

without giving any umbrage. They addressed themselves to the archbishop of Granada, and having informed him, that a great number of their poor countrymen, coming about their business to the city, were taken sick and died, without receiving either temporal or spiritual comforts; they intreated him to procure a place for erecting an hospital without the gates, promising to leave it intirely to his direction. He obtained for them this favour, and afterwards passes for those whom they named to go abroad, and beg a sum sufficient to erect and to endow this hospital; and these were the very men who managed the insurrection. They first fixed upon Holy Thursday; but finding their preparations not complete, they put it off to Christmas Eve. In the mean time, another deputy of theirs, who was going to Africa, was discovered by accident; and tho' he made his escape into the mountains, yet his papers were seized, and sent to the court by the count de Tendrilla, which gave such light into their designs, that the king ordered the marquis de Mondejar to repair immediately to Granada, who, by his great prudence, prevented their surprizing that city. At the time appointed, however, or rather a little before, they revolted every-where in the country; and having elected Don Ferdinand de Valor, a young man of the age of twenty-four, very rich, extremely brave, and very prudent, they proclaimed him, by the name of Mohammed Aben Humeya, king of Granada and Cordova, of which family he really was, and some of them had formerly bore the same title. He swore, at the time of his election, to live and die in support of the Mohammedan religion. After the revolt, they committed every-where the most outrageous excesses, and the most inexcusable cruelties, more especially on ecclesiastics and women, profaning churches, and expressing such an aversion and detestation of the Christian religion, as if they were desirous of justifying all that their enemies had said of them, and to bring those who had interceded on their behalf into suspicion with the court, or at least into contempt.

In the month of May, the king named his brother Don Juan of Austria captain-general of the gallies of Spain, sent him to *Carthagen*a to take upon him the command having given him very full instructions in regard to the rations of the campaign, and of his own conduct. Juan having with him Don Alvaro Bazan, and most old officers, received from them, with all imaginable whatever counsels and lights they thought fit to give him, visited the coasts of Italy and of Africa, examined the ports, changed the garrisons, and returned to court in the month of September, and made a large report to the king of the condition in which he found things every-where, with which his majesty was highly satisfied <sup>1</sup>. The queen Donna Isabella, who the year before had been delivered of another daughter, the infanta Donna Catalina, being in the fifth month of her third pregnancy, died of a miscarriage on the third of October, not without strong suspicions that her death was owing to ignorance, or something worse, in her physicians <sup>2</sup>. The murmurs this occasioned were extremely heightened, when it came to be known that the king had entered into a negotiation for marrying the archduchess Anne of Austria, whom the emperor had intended for his son <sup>3</sup>. He sent, upon this occasion, his brother the archduke Charles to the court of Spain, with instructions to persuade the king, if possible, to recall the duke of Alba, and to pardon the prince of Orange. All possible marks of kindness and respect were shewn to the archduke; but the advices he gave in the emperor's name were not only slighted, but ill-received; and the successes which the duke of Alba had this year in the Low Countries were magnified, as if he had actually put an end to the war <sup>4</sup>.

9 CABRERA, HERRERA. 10 LUY'S DE MARMOL, . . .
JAL. 11 DON DIEGO DE MENDOZA.

1568.

War with
the Mo-
rescoes in Granada
carried on
with incredible
fury.

MOHAMMED ABEN HUMAYA laboured all that was in his power to obtain assistance from the princes of Africa, and from the grand signior. The former promised much, and gave little; but as for the latter, he neither promised nor gave any thing at all. The Christians, under the command of the marquis de Mondejar, took the field, and carried on the war with vigour; but the marquis, who was thoroughly persuaded in his own mind, that a great part of the Morescoes involved in this rebellion were in reality Christians, driven to madness and despair by oppression and ill usage, treated them with lenity, and received many to mercy; by which he gained very useful intelligence, and brought the war, as he imagined, very near to an end. At Granada, however, the president Deza gave out that the marquis husbanded the war, in order to enrich himself and his captains by the plunder of the Morescoes, for whom, at the same time, they suggested he had too much compassion, and held a correspondence with them inconsistent with the king's service. The marquis wrote to the archbishop of Granada, and justified himself fully; but

<sup>1</sup> LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN.
RERAS.    <sup>2</sup> CARRERA.

<sup>3</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>4</sup> FER-

It vexed him so much, that, having dispossessed the Moreiscos of a post of great consequence, he caused the old men, women, and children, they had left behind them, to be put to the sword; an action unworthy of so great a man, and of which he was very much ashamed all his life after. The marquis de los Velez also entered the Alpujarros, and had many actions against the Moreiscos with different fortune; but he was jealous of the marquis of Mondejar, and would not act in concert with him, which turned to the prejudice of both. The king, to put an end to these disputes, sent his brother Don Juan of Austria to command in chief with very full powers. He acted with great prudence; and, having received the advice both of the marquis of Mondejar and of the president, he sent them in writing to the king, and desired to know whose advice he should take.

THE preference that was for some time given to violent Reasons councils furnished Aben Humeya with a better army than he why the had before, though he had been twice beaten by the mar- king quis de Mondejar. He shewed great dexterity and courage in would not the perilous situation in which he was; for his father Don extermi- Antonio and his brother Don Francisco Valor were prisoners nate those at Granada, and this induced him to write to the marquis of people, as Mondejar and to Don Juan of Austria, which raised suspi- he was cions in his own people. He chastized such as discovered pressed to them with great severity, and, amongst the rest, put to death do. his father in law; and by giving a loose to his passions, in taking several women, created such jealousies, that one of his secretaries, by counterfeiting an order for cutting the throats of a body of Moors that came from Barbary to his assistance, engaged them to conspire against him, and set up Lopez Aben 1569. Abu, at whose instance they seized the unfortunate Aben Humeya, and, notwithstanding he gave them the strongest assurances of his innocence, resolved to strangle him. When he found his death inevitable, he declared himself a Christian, and that he had acted out of revenge for the injuries done to his father and his family. Lopez Aben Abu assumed, with the royal dignity, the name of Muley Abdallah, took all imaginable precautions to prevent the Christians from penetrating into the mountains, laboured to procure fresh succours from Barbary, and, notwithstanding the duke of Sessa and Don Juan in person acted against him with numerous troops, and gained several advantages, he found ways and means to keep up the war to the conclusion of the year. The king Don Philip was exceedingly disturbed by this dangerous rebellion in the heart of his kingdom, and yet he was very unwilling to rely wholly upon his arms for putting an end to it, paying great regard to the suggestions of the marquis de Mondejar; that if the country of Alpujarras was totally depeopled, he would only gain a parcel of black rocks and desert mountains, into which the Moors from Barbary might steal over at pleasure, and keep up a war without end. This year queen Elizabeth of England seized a great sum of money he was sending into Flanders, which induced the first open rupture between the two courts; and this year the king concluded his marriage with the archduchess Anne of Austria, his niece<sup>a</sup>, notwithstanding he could not be ignorant how this was censured throughout Europe.

An end at length put to this war, and the arrival of the archduchess queen in Spain.
1570.

DON Juan of Austria and the duke de Sessa renewed the war against the Morescoes immediately after Christmas, and met at first with a very obstinate resistance, by which numbers of men, and some persons of distinction, amongst whom was Lewis Quixada, whom Don Juan revered and loved as a father, were lost. Some strong places were reduced, and others revolted; so that on the whole there was a great slaughter on both sides, and no great success on either. In the mean time the king, by the advice of the president Deza, caused the Morescoes to be removed out of the city and plain of Granada into the kingdom of Castile, where they had lands given them, and satisfaction for what they left behind. However, some of the noble families expostulated upon this treatment, and insisted upon the privileges they had from Don Ferdinand and the emperor Charles, upon their constant fidelity to the crown of Spain, the services they had rendered, and the impossibility of making satisfaction for their large estates; upon which the president was obliged to demand an explanation of the king's order, and whether it would admit of any exceptions. To this Don Philip answered, that the privileges of his predecessors were inviolable, that it was never his intention to invade them, and that the Morescoes, distinguished by their fidelity, should be likewise distinguished by marks of his favour. This declaration had a great effect, for some of the chiefs of the rebels immediately began to treat, and even Lopez Aben Abo insinuated, that he had been forced to do all that he had done; upon which Don Juan offered him pardon, and great possessions; but he acted perfidiously, and murdered Abaqui, a noble Moresco, who had laboured honestly to put an end to these troubles; which induced another of his countrymen to treat him in the same manner; and, upon his death, the public tranquillity was quickly restored<sup>a</sup>. This war of the Morescoes lasted between two and three years, cost the lives of twenty thousand Castilian soldiers, about five times that number of Morescoes, and depopulated and destroyed some of the finest countries in Spain. The king, towards the close of the summer, made great preparations for the celebration of his marriage; which he might well do, since, upon his making a tour to Seville in the spring, which city he had never before honoured with his presence, they made him a present of six hundred thousand ducats<sup>b</sup>. His intended consort, the archduchess Anne, came from Germany into the Low Countries, where the duke of Alba had prepared a fleet to transport her into Spain; and though at that time, and chiefly through his management, there was no good understanding between the two courts, yet queen Elizabeth, in point of civility, sent an English squadron to escort the archduchess, and to invite her to put into any English port, in case the season, which was far advanced, should render it expedient<sup>c</sup>. She embarked on the 24th of September, and arrived, without any accident, at the port of St. Andero in Biscay, from whence, accompanied by her brothers the archdukes Albert and Wenceslaus, she continued her journey to Valladolid, where she was met by the archdukes Rodolph and Ernest, and from thence came to Segovia, where she was received by the princess Donna Juanna and the cardinal Zuniga Espinosa. There the marriage was celebrated about the middle of November, after which the court returned to Madrid<sup>d</sup>. The king entered this year into what was called the Holy League against the Turks, in favour of the Venetians, and sent prince Doria with his gallies to join the fleet of the allies; which, though a great force, did little, through the disputes that arose amongst the several generals who commanded. The duke of Alba, having rendered himself universally odious in the Low Countries by his cruelties, displeased his master by his imprudence, in causing his own statue to be erected at Antwerp, with figures representing the states under his feet<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> DIEGO DE MENDOZA.

<sup>z</sup> CAMDEN'S Annals, Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. v. part i. p. 175.

A GENERAL council was held at Venice, composed of the Don Juan ministers of the powers embarked in the holy league, where- gains in it was agreed, that the fleet should consist of two hundred against the gallies, and the army of fifty thousand foot and four thou- Turks the sand horse. The pope agreed to furnish the sixth part of glorious the expence; the smaller states of Italy the like proportion victory of Lepanto.

1571,

<sup>a</sup> GASPAR ESCOLANO<sup>b</sup> ORTIZ DE ZUNIGA.<sup>c</sup> CABRERA,<sup>d</sup> HERRERA.<sup>e</sup> THUANUS.

amongst them, which did not take effect; the republic of Venice a third, and his catholic majesty one half. Mark Antonio Colonna was appointed to command the pope's galleys, the Venetians named for their general Sebastian Venier, and Don Juan of Austria was declared generalissimo of the league<sup>f</sup>. The emperor of the Ottomans, Selim, having reduced a great part of Cyprus, sent his fleet, consisting of two hundred and eighty galleys, exclusive of ships of war and galliots, commanded in chief by Hali basha, and under him by four other bashas, with orders to fight the Christians at all events, and where-ever he found them. In the mean time Don Juan of Austria, having assembled the fleet of the league, and reviewed them carefully, found the Venetian galleys feebly manned, and indifferently provided with ammunition. To remedy the first, he put on board them four thousand of his own troops, and supplied the latter from his stores. At Corfu a grand council was held, when, by the advice of prince Doria, the following orders were settled: The van, consisting of fifty-four galleys carrying green streamers, was commanded by Andrew Doria, which, in the line of battle, was to form on the right; Don Juan, with the grand commander of Castile, and the generals of the pope and the republic of Venice, followed next, with sixty-four galleys, whose streamers were blue, the standard of the league being carried by the Real; this squadron was to compose the main body in the line: then came the proveditore Barbarigo with his squadron of fifty-five galleys, and yellow streamers, which was to form the left; the rear guard, which consisted of thirty galleys with white streamers, was commanded by the marquis of Santa Cruz; and in this order, on the 7th of October, the two fleets met in the gulph of Lepanto. The Turks formed in a half-moon, into which they brought two hundred and thirty galleys and seventy galliots. The first shot was fired by Hali basha, and answered by Don Juan of Austria from the Real. The Christians made no great haste to engage, depending upon the artillery of their galleasses, which were extremely well served, and put the Turks into great confusion; at length Barbarigo, with the left wing, began the attack, and the battle became general about half an hour after twelve. Don Juan engaged the gally of Hali, and, after an obstinate resistance, carried it, the commander being killed upon the spot. Upon this, he ordered the banner of the cross to be displayed from the mainmast, and the head of Hati to be fixed upon a pike, and placed in the stern; after this, it was all carnage and confusion; and if Uluciali, who was in the left wing, had not retired in time with 28 gallees, the whole Ottoman fleet had been destroyed. As it was, they lost thirty thousand men, besides ten thousand that were taken prisoners, and fifteen thousand Christian slaves released. Thirty gallees were sunk, twenty-five burnt, and one hundred and thirty taken. On the side of the Christians, the loss, in the whole, was about ten thousand men; but, which was much greater, for the want of unanimity in their generals, they lost the fruits of their victory, and, after disputing a long time about what they should do, agreed at last to do nothing. The king Don Philip celebrated this victory by a feast, which continued nine days; and appointed the anniversary to be kept for ever in the cathedral of Toledo, to which he sent the standard of the grand signor, and other trophies &c. The queen, on the 4th of December, was delivered of the prince Don Ferdinand; and in this year the Spaniards seized the important fortrefs of Final, to which they pretended no better title, than that it might fall into worse hands <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> ANTONIUS GABUTIUS, libri vi. de vita & rebus gestis Pii V. Pont. Max. sp. Romæ, 1605.

THE next year a grand council was held at Rome, to consider of the most effectual method for continuing the war. The grand commander of Castile, who was there on the part of the crown of Spain, proposed, that the pope, the Venetians, and the lesser states of Italy, should attack Albania and the adjacent countries; that the maritime force of Spain should be employed against the Turks and Moors in Africa; while the emperor and the king of Poland made a powerful diversion on the side of Hungary. But those who could concur in nothing else, were unanimous in rejecting this; to which the sentiments of the pope did not a little contribute, who was against dividing the forces of the league <sup>i</sup>. On the other hand, the emperor of the Ottomans gave the command of his fleet to Uluciali, one of the ablest officers in his service, and who with incredible diligence assembled a greater naval force than could well be imagined. He dispatched likewise an ambassador to Charles the ninth of France, to dissuade him from entering into the holy league, and this not without effect <sup>k</sup>. The death of pope Pius the fifth was another unlucky incident, because the princes of his commu-

The next campaign proves fruitless, tho' highly honourable to Don Juan.

1572.

<sup>b</sup> ANT. DE HERRERA.
RENZO VANDER HAMMEN, BRERA.

<sup>k</sup> ILLESCAS.

<sup>i</sup> I.O.
<sup>k</sup> P. DANIEL, CA-

nion looked upon him as a saint <sup>1</sup>. He was succeeded by cardinal Buoncompagno, who assumed the name of Gregory the thirteenth <sup>2</sup>. The allies were very apprehensive, that, fresh troubles breaking out in the Low Countries, his catholic majesty would quit the league, from which he received little benefit, and to which he contributed most. The king, however, assured them he had no such intentions, and, to convince them of it, he ordered Don Juan of Austria to take the command of the confederate fleet. That prince went accordingly to Italy, where he had an interview with the princess Margaret his sister, whom he had never seen before <sup>3</sup>. He then proceeded to Naples, and, as soon as the fleet of the allies assembled, he went and took the command. His active spirit led him immediately in search of the Turkish fleet: Uluciali, who was much inferior in strength, advanced to meet him, but, like a great seaman, often offered him battle, and as often avoided fighting. At length Don Juan blocked him up in the port of Modon, where he would have attacked him, but most of the other generals said it was impracticable, as his fleet was protected by a good fortrefs, and many batteries along the coast. Don Juan replied, that when they were once engaged, the cannon on shore must cease firing, or do as much mischief to their friends as to their foes; but the other generals persisting in their opinion, the fleet retired, after having performed little or nothing; but Don Juan's character was as much raised by the proposition he made in this, as by the victory he gained the year before <sup>4</sup>. This year the king lost his great favourite, and his principal minister. The first was Ruy Gomez de Silva, prince of Eboli <sup>5</sup>, singular in this, that, during the king's whole reign, he had remained equally possessed of his good graces, and died as much regretted by the people as by his master; the other was cardinal Espinosa <sup>6</sup>, of whom his master Philip said, long after he was dead, that he was the greatest minister Spain ever could boast; and yet Spain had produced cardinal Ximenes, who had possessed his master's confidence long after he lost his affections.

He forms a project of becoming DON Juan of Austria, in obedience to the king's orders, had employed infinite care and diligence in augmenting, repairing, and equipping, his fleet, that, in conjunction with the allies, he might put to sea in the month of April, fully king of determined to proceed through the Archipelago, and put an end to the naval power of the Turks for a century at least; but when he thought himself in a condition to execute this project, he received the surprising news, that the Venetians had made their peace with the Turks; upon which he caused the colours of the league to be struck, and hoisted the banner of Spain<sup>r</sup>. The king either was not, or did not seem much displeased. He removed Juan de Soto, who was secretary to his brother, and made him intendant of the fleet, on account of his advising his master to think of doing something for himself, and of acquiring an independent sovereignty at the expence of the infidels. Juan de Escovado succeeded him as secretary to the prince; and the king, who bestowed upon him several favours, told him plainly the reasons for which he had removed his predecessor<sup>s</sup>. He afterwards sent orders to Don Juan to reduce Tunis, and to demolish it. The season was very late before this order could be put in execution; but it was executed by the bare appearance of the fleet, for the Turks abandoned it; the prince, contrary to Don Philip's order, fortified the town, and marked out a new citadel, capable of holding eight thousand men; and afterwards, by the advice of both his secretaries, engaged the pope to propose to his brother declaring him king of Tunis. To this Don Philip answered, that the respect as well as affection he had for his brother would not permit him to grant that request, as he knew the grand signor meditated the recovery of all the places held by the Christians in Africa; and that, in its proper season, he would explain himself to his brother's satisfaction<sup>t</sup>. This year the royal family was increased by the birth of the infant Don Carlos; soon after which died the infanta Donna Joanna, the king's sister<sup>u</sup>. This year also he removed to the escurial the bodies of his queen Donna Isabella and of the prince Don Carlos, as also those of the emperor Charles the fifth, of the empress, of Donna Leonora queen of Portugal and France, of his brothers and sisters, and of his aunt Donna Maria queen of Hungary; at the same time he caused the body of his grandmother Donna Joanna to be transferred to Granada, and interred there near the bodies of Ferdinand and Isabella<sup>w</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> ANTONIO DE FUENMAYOR, Vie du Pape Pie V. par JEAN BAPT. FEUILLET.    <sup>2</sup> ILLESCAS.    <sup>3</sup> LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN.    <sup>4</sup> CABRERA.    <sup>5</sup> FERRERAS.    <sup>6</sup> HERRERA.

1573.

<sup>r</sup> LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN.
<sup>s</sup> HERRERA.
<sup>t</sup> SURENA.

<sup>u</sup> Idem, & FER-
<sup>w</sup> CAMPANA. <sup>v</sup> SI-

All these places, of which his kingdom
was to be formed,
conquered
by the Turks.

1574.

THIS year opened with a scene which never would have happened if the king had not lost the cardinal his minister. The wars in which the king had been so long involved in the Low Countries, and in the defence of Italy, and the places he possessed in Africa against the Turks, had constrained him to borrow money upon his revenues, from those in other countries, as well as the bankers in his own dominions, for which they had assignments. To supply his present necessities, he had recourse to the states, and they advised him to supersede those assignments; and to deduct, after liquidating his creditors demands, what he judged reasonable in regard to usury and exchange. His own subjects thought this hard; but those who durst call things by their proper names said, that he had declared himself a bankrupt. In consideration of this worthy action, the states gave him another tenth of the Alcavala; and thus, for a small temporary advantage, he lost his credit for ever*. The apprehensions of the Turkish fleet was the great motive to this measure, of which the king gave notice to cardinal Granvelle, viceroy of Naples; to the duke of Terra Nova, who had the government of Sicily; and to Don Juan of Austria, who was then in Italy; with express orders to provide in time for the safety of the Gouletta and of Tunis. Don Juan did all in his power; but the viceroys were so much concerned for the provinces under their government, that they did not do what they might have done in time. The consequence was, that Sinan basha, who commanded the Turkish fleet, landed forty thousand men without opposition; upon which the Christians abandoned Tunis, and retired into the new fort. Sinan basha, leaving the command of the fleet to Uluciali, invested both that, and the Gouletta at the same time: the former was carried by assault; and Don Pedro Porto-carrero, with the small remains of his garrison, carried into slavery. The new fort had the same fate not long after; so that the Spaniards lost all they had been so long acquiring, and at least twelve thousand good troops. The king thereupon sent prince Vespasian Gonzaga to examine the state of things at Oran, who, finding them in disorder, fortified Mxzalquivir, and abandoned the place before-mentioned. Don Juan of Austria, who was hindered by the bad weather from going in person to the relief of the fortresses in Africa, was exceedingly chagrined at their loss; but the king bore it with great temper, and laid no blame either upon Don Juan, or the people who commanded†.

* CARRERA.

† LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN.

Don Juan had this year the honour of entertaining Henry the third of France at Cremona, in his return from Poland to his hereditary dominions <sup>2</sup>.

THE death of the Turkish emperor Selim gave some hopes Don Juan that the war would not be continued with the same vivacity; of Austria but these were quickly dashed by the news that a numerous <sup>forms, not-</sup> fleet was equipping at Constantinople. Don Juan of Austria, <sup>withstand-</sup> who was then at Genoa, pressed the king so warmly for leave <sup>ing. new</sup> to return to Spain, that he obtained it. His business was to <sup>pretensions</sup> solicit two requests; the first was, to be declared infant of Castile; and the other to be created lieutenant-general of Italy. <sup>on his brother.</sup> After mature deliberation, the king refused the first, because 1575. there was no precedent of any such thing; and declined the latter, by telling him his presence was necessary in Italy, and that he would send full powers after him <sup>3</sup>. The Turkish fleet made an attempt upon Calabria; but were so roughly handled, that they thought proper to return to Constantinople. This year was fatal to the infant Don Carlos; but the queen was delivered on the 12th of July, which was three days after, of the infant Don Diego <sup>b</sup>.

IN the spring of the year died Don Lewis de Requesens, <sup>The king</sup> who had succeeded the duke of Alba in the government of the Low Countries, and the king immediately resolved to send <sup>sends him</sup> Don Juan of Austria thither. Don Juan, who knew very well that both money and troops were wanting, sent Esco-Countries <sup>vedo</sup> his secretary to court, who presented so many and so <sup>with dis-</sup> sharp memorials, that the king directed Antonio Perez, who <sup>cretionary</sup> was secretary of state, to tell him, that he would not be <sup>powers</sup> importuned, and that he should learn to write in a more be- <sup>there.</sup> coming stile <sup>c</sup>. Don Juan, perplexed with this delay, em- 1576. barked at Genoa, and came to Barcelona, of which he gave the king notice, who, to avoid receiving him as an infant of Castile, which he knew that prince expected, retired to the escorial, and sent for him thither. At his audience, he would have kissed the king's hand; but Don Philip, rising from his seat, threw his arms round his neck, and embraced him. He then kissed the queen's; and, in paying the same respect to the infant Don Ferdinand, he raised his forehead with the pommel of his sword. The child cried out violently; upon which the king took him in his hands, and said to Don Juan, "God be praised, it is only a scratch." "So much the better," replied Don Juan; "for, if it had been ever so dangerous, here is no window out of which-

<sup>2</sup> LORENZO VANDER HAMMEN.
ERRA.      <sup>3</sup> FERRERAS.

<sup>1</sup> CABRERA.

<sup>b</sup> HER-

“ I could have thrown myself.” “ Brother,” added the king coldly, “ more or less dangerous would not have altered the case, for it would have been still an accident, and accidents are not in our power<sup>d</sup>.” The king held several councils, to which the duke of Alba, the marquis de los Velos, and the secretary Perez, were called ; and the result was, that the king left every thing to his brother’s discretion, except the point of liberty of conscience, which he absolutely refused to grant. As so much time had been lost, the king enjoined him to pass through France in disguise, which he did in quality of domestic to Ottavio Gonzaga, and arrived safely at Luxemburgh<sup>e</sup>. Muley Mohammed, who had been expelled the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco by his brother, solicited Don Philip to restore him by force of arms ; but the king, grown weary of African expeditions, declined it. He then applied himself to his nephew Don Sebastian, king of Portugal ; who sent one of his ministers to solicit the assistance of Don Philip in this enterprize, and to demand one of his daughters in marriage. The king answered, that the infantas were too young ; and that if his nephew, under the appearance of devotion, would come to our lady of Guadalupe, he would meet him there ; which he did ; and the duke of Alba had a share in the conference. The king and the duke both laboured to dissuade Don Sebastian from the war, by shewing him how great an army was necessary to do any thing in Africa, how impossible it was to subsist such an army, and how little he could rely upon the promises of a Moor. These remonstrances were vain ; and the king was at last forced to promise his nephew, that he would furnish him with fifty galleys and five thousand men, provided the Turk had no fleet at sea<sup>f</sup>. This year died at Rome the unfortunate doctor Carranza, archbishop of Toledo, after being obliged to abjure certain doctrines, which he affirmed in the most solemn manner, when he was dying, he had never supported or believed. His persecution is said to have been owing to the envy of a great prelate, who had passionately fought what without desiring Carranza obtained. In Spain some had still their doubts about him, but at Rome he was unanimously regarded as a saint<sup>g</sup>.

Don Philip makes peace with THE king Don Philip, in order to be better informed of the state of affairs in Morocco, sent over Francisco Aldana, who had been long a prisoner in that country, and was well

<sup>d</sup> CABRERA.
de la Vida y Hechos de D. Sebastian, Rey de Portugal, por JUAN DE BAENA.

<sup>e</sup> VANDER HAMMEN.
<sup>f</sup> ILLESCAS.

<sup>g</sup> Epitome

acquainted with Muley Moloch. He was extremely well received by that king, and, after he had remained there some time, was kindly dismissed. At his return, he assured his catholic majesty, that Muley Moloch had a great body of Turks about his person, was well provided with artillery, and could raise a numerous army without difficulty; upon which he was sent to make the like report to Don Sebastian, though it proved to no purpose. The king procured for his brother-in-law the archduke Albert a hat from Rome, and the grand cross of Malta for the archduke Wenceslaus, with one of the richest commanderies that order had in his kingdom. The news brought him by captain Aldana made him very apprehensive that the Turks might seize the kingdoms of Fex and Morecco; and as he by no means desired such neighbours, he caused it to be intimated to Muley Moloch, that he was well disposed towards him. That monarch, who needed, immediately solicited his friendship; so that an alliance was quickly concluded, and, by the interposition of the Venetians, the king made a truce with the Turks for three years. In consequence of these measures, he sent the duke of Medina Cœli, in the winter, to dissuade Don Sebastian from attempting the war in Africa, but without any effect <sup>h</sup>.

In the spring of the year the king had the news of the arrival of the archduke Matthias, whom the confederates had invited into the Low Countries, and whom they acknowledged as their governor<sup>i</sup>. On the last day of March Juan de Escovedo, secretary to the prince Don Juan of Austria, was assassinated in the streets<sup>k</sup>. The general opinion was, that he was in the secret of his master's intention to espouse queen Elizabeth of England, and that this induced the king to order him to be put to death. But it is very certain that he was murdered by the express direction of the secretary Antonio Perez, who gave out to those he employed, that it was for his majesty's service; and that he procured for them, by way of reward, commands in the army in Italy: it is also certain, that Perez had twice attempted to poison him before, once at his house, to which he invited him for that purpose, and another time by procuring poison to be put into his victuals at home, which he escaped by accidentally dining abroad, and of which his wife had like to have died, and on this account a poor slave was unjustly put to death<sup>l</sup>. This assassination made a great noise at the time, and was attended, as such actions always are, with very fatal conse-

Don Juan of Austria dies in the Low Countries, not without suspicion of poison.

1578.

<sup>h</sup> CABRERA.
HAMMEN.

<sup>i</sup> EMANUEL METEREN.
<sup>l</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>k</sup> VANDER

quences. On the fourth of April the queen was delivered of the infant Don Philip, who succeeded his father <sup>m</sup>. This year, however, was very fatal to the royal family; for on the 7th of October died Don Juan of Austria of a malignant fever<sup>a</sup>, as some say, but, as others assert, not without a great suspicion of poison. On the eighteenth of the same month died the prince Don Ferdinand, at the age of sixteen, to the inexpressible grief of his parents; and on the 24th died the archduke Wenceslaus<sup>b</sup>. This year was also fatal to the unfortunate Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, who perished in his rash expedition into Africa<sup>c</sup>, as we shall have occasion to shew at large in its proper place; and as soon as the news of it arrived at Madrid, the king sent orders to cover the places which the Portuguese possessed in that country.

Antonio Perez, secretary of state, and the prince of Eboli, disgraced and imprisoned. The cardinal Don Henry having assumed the regal dignity in Portugal immediately after the death of Don Sebastian was known, felt very early the cares of a crown; for, on the one side, he was solicited by the people to marry, that the independency of Portugal might be preserved; and, on the other, he was pressed by the ambassadors of Don Philip to regulate and declare the succession. His catholic majesty, who had not the least scruple about his own right, sent a friar to persuade the king of Portugal, that, being a priest, a bishop, and a cardinal, he could not in conscience, or with any degree of decency, marry, more especially at his time of life. He likewise applied to the pope, to prevent any dispensation from being obtained for that purpose; alleging the great scandal that would attend it, and what advantages would be taken of such a step by heretics. The king Don Henry, who, though no great politician, was an honest, pious, and just man, was absolutely deaf to these insinuations. At Rome they opened but one ear to his catholic majesty, and at the same time extended one hand, reserving as much for the king of Portugal, that, in so important a business, something might be heard and felt on both sides<sup>d</sup>. The new emperor of Morocco and Fez, perceiving how much it was his interest to be well with the king of Castile, sent over one Andrew Gasparo, a Corfican, who negotiated a peace for twenty years between the two crowns; in consideration of which, and of the assistance promised by Don Philip, in case of any foreign invasion or domestic trouble, he yielded to him the town of Larach for their mutual conveniency; and, rejecting the large offers that were made for the ransom

<sup>m</sup> CAMPANA.
BRERA.

<sup>n</sup> ANTONIO CARNERO.
<sup>p</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA.

<sup>o</sup> CA-
<sup>q</sup> ILLESCAS.

of the duke of Barcelos, son to the duke of Braganza, and nephew to the king of Portugal, he made a present of him to king Philip, and sent him to the house of Don Pedro de Vinegas, his ambassador. The council of Castile advised the king to detain him as an honourable prisoner, whom he might otherwise find the most formidable competitor to the crown of Portugal; but Don Philip, with great magnanimity and prudence, rejected their advice, and bound him in stronger chains, by ordering him to be set at liberty, and sent home with all possible marks of kindness and respect. The king caused the body of his brother Don Juan of Austria to be brought privately into Spain, and then to be removed publicly, and with great funeral pomp, to the escorial, and, according to the dying request of that prince, it was there interred, on the 24th of May, close by that of his father the emperor Charles the fifth. On the 29th of July, Antonio Perez, secretary of state, was arrested, and sent to prison, upon some discoveries that were made of the murder of Don Juan's secretary; and the princess of Eboli was at the same time confined for having too great an influence over Perez, by which she had drawn from him some secrets of state. Some time after the secretary, falling sick, had leave to return to his own house, where he was visited by the king's confessor; upon which, and his not being removed from his office, the world, always busy in criticising the actions of princes, made some very strange conclusions.

Don Henry of Portugal, who, though not a great, was The duke a very good prince, declared, that, as to the succession, the king Don Philip, and the duke of Braganza in right of his wife, were the two competitors, and the only two whose rights would admit of a discussion; for as to Don Antonio, prior of Crato, though he had the greatest credit with the populace, yet he esteemed and adjudged him a bastard. He appointed five commissioners to hear and determine the affair of the succession, and in this disposition died, on the last of January; upon this, the five commissioners assumed the government with the title of regents; and though they did all that it was possible to keep the people within bounds, yet their aversion to the Castilians was so strong, that Don Philip's ambassadors could not have been safe, if the duke of Braganza, with great generosity, had not received them * HIERON. DE MENDOZA.

GUENCA.

• CABRERA.

• FARIA Y SOUSA.

• MAYERNE TURQUET.

• SI-

into his palace<sup>x</sup>. But the king, though he was secure of three of the regents, never intended that his title should be regulated by their judgments; but, having taken his measures from the very death of his nephew, had an army and a fleet ready to put him in possession of that kingdom. He resolved to put at the head of his forces the best officer in his dominions, which was the duke of Alba, old in disgrace, and at that time a prisoner; the reason of which was this: His eldest son Don Garcia de Toledo had given a promise to one of the queen's ladies of honour, which he refused to make good; upon which the king caused him to be arrested, and sent to Tordesillas. His father the duke took him from thence by force, carried him to his own castle of Alba, and there married him to his cousin Donna Maria de Toledo, daughter to the marquis of Villena. The king could not but punish this offence, tho' perhaps he did not highly resent it. However it was, upon the death of the king of Portugal he sent to know of the duke, if his health would permit him to command an army; who replied, that his strength and abilities, such as they were, should be always devoted to his service. The king then sent him directions to come to some place near Madrid, where he might receive his orders; and he did accordingly come to Barajos, where they were sent him, without his seeing the king at all<sup>y</sup>. As soon as the Spanish troops entered Portugal, the populace proclaimed Don Antonio king, first at Santaron, and then at Lisbon; notwithstanding which, the duke of Alba reduced the kingdom without much trouble, after defeating Don Antonio in two battles<sup>z</sup>. The king, in the mean time, after causing the prince Don Diego to be acknowledged his successor by the nobility, advanced to Badajoz, where he fell ill towards the end of September, and was hardly out of danger before the queen, whom he had sent for thither, was seized with a violent fever, of which she died on the 26th of October, in the 31st year of her age, exceedingly regretted by the king and by his subjects<sup>a</sup>.

Don Philip goes in person into Portugal, and is acknowledged by the states.

THE king, at the request of the duke of Alba, entered Portugal in the spring, and opened the assembly of the states at the convent of Tomar, where the nobility, clergy, and deputies from the cities, did homage and swore allegiance; the duke of Braganza and his son the duke of Barcelos being the first who took the oaths<sup>b</sup>. The king then granted a

<sup>x</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA.
<sup>a</sup> SIQUEIRA.

<sup>y</sup> CABRERA.

<sup>z</sup> VUPERANUS.

<sup>b</sup> ANTONIO D'ESCORAR,

general pardon, excepting to Don Antonio, and fifty-two others, who were named; he bestowed likewise many favours upon the nobility, who remained notwithstanding discontented, and, if we may trust some of the Spanish historians, the revenues of Portugal would not have satisfied their expectations<sup>c</sup>. On the 29th of June he made his public entry into Lisbon, where not long after the fleet from the Indies arrived; which gave him great satisfaction, more especially as he understood that he had been acknowledged and proclaimed there; and consequently, by the end of the year, was intirely master of the kingdom of Portugal, the islands of Azores only excepted<sup>d</sup>. As for the unfortunate Don Antonio, he remained disguised and concealed in the kingdom till towards winter, and then found a passage to England, where he was kindly received and protected by queen Elizabeth<sup>e</sup>.

THE king, having spent the winter at Lisbon, found himself, at the beginning of the new year, in greater perils and perplexities than ever he was in his life; persecuted with numberless demands, which it was impossible for him to grant; and which, if he denied, was likely to increase that discontent which was too great and dangerous already. He had sent for his sister the empress Donna Maria, upon the death of his queen, to take care of his children; and, not finding him at Madrid, she came to Lisbon. The king received her with all possible respect and kindness, and had some thoughts of making her regent of that kingdom; but he soon laid that aside, to prevent the disputes that must have arisen with another lady, who had appointed herself regent. This was the duchess of Braganza. The king had in general promised to comply with her demands; but when she came to make them, he did not think himself obliged to keep his word. She expected to be made regent, to have a great number of towns given her in property, and to have all her debts paid, with some other things of less consequence. In this embarrassed condition the king first sent away his sister, and then took the report of five Portuguese commissioners, whom he had appointed to consider of the duchess's demands; who said, that if his majesty gave her seven hundred and fifty thousand ducats to pay her debts, she ought to esteem it a great favour, as well as a full satisfaction<sup>f</sup>. Don Antonio, by the assistance of the queen mother of France, and other princes who pitied his condition, equipped

Becomes
very uneasy there,
and finds it impossible to render himself
beloved.

1582;

<sup>c</sup> CAMPANA.
Annals.

<sup>d</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA,
HERRERA.

<sup>e</sup> CAMDEN'S

a fleet of sixty sail, with a considerable body of forces on board, with which he proposed to go to the Azores. In their passage, or rather as they were on the point of entering into port, they were attacked by the marquis de Santa Cruz, with a Spanish squadron under his command, and totally defeated. In this battle three hundred persons were taken prisoners, amongst whom were thirty noblemen and fifty gentlemen. They produced French commissions, and expected to be treated as prisoners of war; but the marquis finding by papers, that their chief aim was to intercept the fleet from the Indies, insisted there was no war between the crowns of France and Castile, treated them all as pirates, beheaded the gentlemen, and hanged the rest without mercy. On the 21st of November died the prince Don Diego, to the great grief of the whole Spanish monarchy<sup>a</sup>, as well as of his father, who, though he was esteemed the greatest master of dissimulation of any prince of his time, and made his utmost efforts to appear calm and easy amongst his new subjects, found it impossible to conceal the anxiety that this and other untoward accidents gave him; more especially when he found that all his efforts to gain the affections of the Portuguese were fruitless and ineffectual. In this year pope Gregory the thirteenth made that famous alteration in the calendar which produced the distinction of old stile and new; and though it was perhaps not well understood, and withal very little pleasing to the Castilians, the king caused it to be observed and brought into use through all the countries under his dominion, as in such cases he piqued himself extremely upon shewing his respect and submission to the see of Rome<sup>l</sup>.

Returns into Spain, IT is no great wonder, if, in this situation of things, the king grew weary of his residence at Lisbon, where, when he had caused his son the infant Don Philip to be acknowledged and sworn to as successor, and had directed the bodies of the two last kings Sebastian and Henry, together with the remains of twenty other persons of the royal family, to be transferred to the chapel of Belem, he made preparations for his departure<sup>k</sup>; at which time the duke of Alba being sick, he visited him with all the kindness of a friend, and shewed great concern for his death<sup>l</sup>. On his leaving Portugal, he appointed the cardinal archduke Albert regent, and brought many of the Portuguese nobility with him to the escorial, where, to his great satisfaction, he found most of those things executed which he had directed, and seemed to please himself with the hopes of repose, when in truth the busiest and least agreeable part of his life was yet to come<sup>m</sup>. He was desirous, however, of reducing the Azores islands, and sent the marquis de Santa Cruz with a fleet for that purpose, which service he performed with great success; but it would have turned more to his reputation, if it had been attended with less bloodshed; but the adherents to Don Antonio in those islands had given great provocation; the marquis was naturally severe, and the executions that followed upon their reduction were numerous and cruel<sup>n</sup>. There happened nothing of great importance in the succeeding year, except the assembly of the states of Castile and Leon at Madrid, for acknowledging the infant Don Philip, and the conclusion of a marriage between the duke of Savoy and the infanta Donna Catalina; to which the king consented, upon condition that the duke came in person to espouse her<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> CONESTAGGIO.<sup>b</sup> SIGUENCA.<sup>l</sup> ILLESCAS.<sup>k</sup> CARRERA.<sup>l</sup> ANT. DE HERRERA.

1583.

1584.

In the beginning of the year the galleys of Spain were sent to bring that prince; and the king, with the whole court, went into Arragon, where at Saragossa the marriage was consummated in the month of February, and in June the king accompanied his son-in-law to Barcelona, where he embarked for his own dominions<sup>p</sup>. He went afterwards to hold the states of Catalonia, Arragon, and Valencia, at Moncon, in order to have the prince acknowledged by them, where, as things went not altogether to his mind, he fell sick, and upon his recovery, dissolved the states, though his affairs obliged him to remain at Valencia the remainder of the year, where he received the ambassadors of some princes of Japan, who afterwards went to Rome, to pay obedience in the name of their masters to the pope<sup>q</sup>. In the succeeding year, finding himself, as his own historians say, deeply touched in his honour by the depredations committed in Europe and America by the English, he entertained a project of making queen Elizabeth feel the whole weight of his resentment. Some say he was excited to this by the prince of Parma; and that, after he had begun his preparations, he was dissuaded from pursuing them by the same prince, who, upon mature deliberation, foresaw the difficulties that would attend such an enterprize, and concluded it impracticable. It is much more probable that he was encouraged to it by the popish fugitives from England, men of a violent and implacable spirit, who, under the veil of religion, sought to vent

Finds himself extremely incommoded by the power and policy of the queen of England.

1585.

<sup>m</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA.<sup>n</sup> ANT. HERRERA.<sup>o</sup> CAM-

PANA.

<sup>p</sup> FERRERAS.<sup>q</sup> CABRERA.

their own passion and resentment; and that he was farther importuned to it by pope Sixtus the fifth is very certain; Besides, Sir Francis Drake had burnt several ships in the road of Cadiz, and had taken a very rich East Indiaman, named the Saint Philip, which provoked the king highly.

1586. The Spanish writers say, that, notwithstanding this, the prince of Parma prevailed upon him to consent to certain conferences for a peace in the Low Countries, which is out of doubt; but when they add, that the propositions of the English commissioners rendered them ineffectual, we have great reason to question their sincerity, since we know that those commissioners came into a great deal of trouble for their complaisance; and that, in the issue of this business, these pacific propositions appeared to be no more than a Spanish amusement. The truth seems to be, that the king had lost his old able ministers; and that his councils were chiefly governed by cardinal Granvelle, who did not live, however, to see the mischiefs and misfortunes they produced.

Resolves to employ
the whole force of his dominions in humbling
that princess.

1588. THE king, bent upon the execution of this expedition, issued his orders for assembling the whole maritime force of his vast dominions, and ordered all the fleet to assemble as early as it was possible at Lisbon; while the prince of Parma had instructions to provide in the Low Countries the greatest force he was able, both by sea and land, for effecting and covering a descent. The steadiness of the king, in pursuing whatever resolution he had once taken, joined to the high opinion the Spaniards had of the invincible force of their maritime power, which at that time was certainly the greatest in Europe, and the zeal, not to say fury, of the catholics, to pull down a princess whom they considered as the protectress of heretics, animated all the preparations for this extraordinary design, for the execution of which the king spared no expence; so that, as Don Bernard de Mendoza (and none knew better) told the president de Thou, it cost the king upwards of thirty-six millions of pieces of eight by that time the fleet was assembled at Lisbon. This invincible armada, as it was stiled, consisted, according to the Spanish accounts, of one hundred and thirty ships of war and galleys, having on board upwards of twenty thousand land troops, and eight thousand two hundred and fifty seamen, besides slaves at the oar. When things were almost ready, the marquis de Santa Cruz, who was to have commanded, died, and the king appointed the duke de Medina Sidonia to succeed him, who would willingly have excused himself, as being conscious of his want of skill in maritime affairs, and was afraid of the king's displeasure. He sailed from Lisbon the 27th of May; but, meeting with very bad weather, was obliged to put into the port of Corunna, where he remained some time, and came in sight of the coast of England on the last of July. They were from that time harassed by the English fleet, composed of small and light ships, which had great advantage over them in the English chanel, and, being commanded by the ablest seamen of that age, pushed their advantage to the utmost. The weather was also favourable to them, and destructive to the Spaniards. The prince of Parma was in the middle of his preparations, and in no condition to execute any thing; so that, after suffering much, and seeing no hopes of executing their enterprize, the duke de Medina Sidonia, and the rest of the Spanish commanders, from meditating a conquest, were brought to study how to escape; and in this they were no less unfortunate, as being in the midst of their enemies, and but very indifferently skilled in navigating those seas. They quickly found it was impossible to retire through the English chanel, and were therefore forced to sail northward, along the coast of Scotland, beaten all the way by furious tempests; and, after losing twelve large ships that ran upon the coast of England, some were also lost upon the west of Scotland, some were driven to Denmark, and some to Ireland. The duke de Medina Sidonia, with the few ships that remained at last, put into St. Andero. The Spaniards compute their loss at thirty-two large ships and ten thousand men, but it was certainly much greater; Mariana says truly, that it ruined their marine, and that the best part of their old troops and most experienced seamen perished in this fatal expedition, which, as in the beginning it was intended to crush England, so in its conclusion it proved the heaviest blow that Spain had ever felt since she became a maritime power<sup>t</sup>. Some great historians, and amongst them Mr. de Thou, say, that the king was so much chagrined, that he would not permit the duke of Medina Sidonia to come to court; but in reality the duke himself declined it, and went to his own house, full of sorrow and regret. But the king issued his orders for relieving all the poor people that returned, and wrote the duke a very kind letter, in which he thanked him for his services, expressed a great concern for the miseries he had endured, and told him, that, in things depending upon the elements, the fault was never to be imputed to men. This letter, as it deserves, is extant, and shews, that whatever passed in his mind, Philip knew how to conceal all his passions<sup>u</sup>.

The dismal catastrophe of his invincible armada, by which his naval power was lost.

<sup>t</sup> CAMPANA.

Spain and Portugal
in great danger by an invasion from England.

1589.

THE next year the king found himself in a new situation, which he little expected; for Don Antonio, who stiled himself king of Portugal, having prevailed upon queen Elizabeth to assist him with a numerous fleet and a powerful army, the former commanded by Sir Francis Drake, and the latter by General Norris, arrived on the coasts of Spain in the spring, where they sacked Corunna, and did a great deal of mischief, which, how much soever it chagrined the Spaniards, in reality undid themselves<sup>w</sup>; for Don Philip immediately sent express after express to the archduke Albert, to provide for the security of Portugal; which had been out of his power, if they had sailed directly to Lisbon, where they did not arrive till the first of June. Don Antonio had promised that his countrymen would rise unanimously in his favour, in which no doubt he went too far; but the bulk of the nation were certainly so inclined, and it was owing to the precautions taken by the archduke that they became masters of the suburbs only, and not of the capital, where, however, it was as much as he could do to restrain the populace from a general insurrection; and, if there had not been a misunderstanding, or at least a want of right intelligence, between the English admiral and general, Don Antonio might have succeeded in his enterprize, or at least have given rise to a long war. But Sir Francis Drake not bringing the English fleet up the Tagus, and the cardinal archduke having burnt all the magazines of provisions without the town, general Norris was obliged to decamp on the 4th for want of provisions. In his retreat, he took the fortress of Cascaes, which was ruined and blown up at his departure; and the English fleet made prizes of a great number of ships, after which they embarked their forces, and returned<sup>x</sup>. Though this was considered as a high dishonour in Spain, yet in reality the loss was very inconsiderable, in comparison of what it might have been; and it so effectually opened the king's eyes, that he studied from this time to suit his councils to his circumstances, and to consider of the properest ways and means to put his own dominions in a state of defence against enemies whom he found to be far more formidable than he had ever imagined; and, if he had not

<sup>u</sup> ANTONIO HERRERA.
HERRERA.

<sup>w</sup> FARIA Y SOUSA.

<sup>x</sup> CA-

done so, it is highly probable that his territories would have suffered more than they did, though, notwithstanding all his care, they suffered a great deal.

THE civil war in France occupied in a great measure the thoughts of Don Philip, at a time when the situation of his own affairs seemed to demand his whole attention, as the necessities of the state required the whole forces of his vast dominions in Europe and elsewhere. But it may be he had continued his intrigues with the catholic league, as it was stiled, so long for his own security, that he could not easily withdraw his protection. Perhaps he looked on the troubles of France as very favourable to his own safety and power; but it is most probable that he had still greater things in view; and that, having procured for himself the administration of that kingdom, under the title of protector of France, he thought it not impracticable to obtain the possession of it for his favourite daughter the infanta Donna Isabella Clara Eugenia, who it was once proposed should espouse the young duke of Guise; but, whatever his motives were, his conduct plainly shewed, that he meant to frustrate the pretensions of Henry the fourth, stiled in Spain the prince of Bearn, to the crown of France; and to the desire of doing this, he sacrificed interests that much more nearly concerned him: for, not content with sending a great corps of Spanish troops to the duke de Mayenne, which weakened his own army in the Low Countries, he sent express orders to the prince of Parma to relieve Paris; which he performed with great reputation to himself, but with irreparable loss to the concerns of Spain in the Netherlands. His expence in support of the French rebels in their own country and at Rome was immense, at the same time that his own affairs everywhere suffered for want of money; and, while he meditated the destruction of other powers, the very means he employed for that purpose exhausted his own.

WE have before mentioned the disgrace and imprisonment of Antonio Perez, the king's secretary of state, who in consequence of his being charged with various crimes, had been sentenced to a fine and imprisonment; and afterwards the old prosecution, for being concerned in the murder of Escovedo, being revived, though he had compounded it with the son of the deceased, by giving him a large sum of money, he was tortured to make a confession, and prosecuted afresh upon that confession. This, tho' he was a man of very

The civil war in France becomes a great object of Don Philip's politics.

1596

Perez tortured on account of the business of Escovedo's murder, and his escape.

Y ANT. HERRERA, BAVIA, Historia y Pontifical, Histoire de la Ligue, par LOUIS MAIMBOURG.

quick

quick parts, drove him to the very extent of them ; so that being a native of the kingdom of Arragon, he contrived to make his escape thither, in order to shelter himself under the privileges of that kingdom, which not without great difficulty he effected. Being again apprehended by the king's orders, upon his appeal to the chief justice, he was carried to Saragossa, and thrown into the prison belonging to that tribunal, of which the justice of Arragon was the chief. But as all proceedings before them were in public, and in a clear and open manner, that by no means answered the intention of his enemies, who made use of the royal authority, as if the king was of that number, they therefore caused it to be suggested to the inquisition, that Perez intended, as soon as he should be acquitted by the tribunal of the chief justice, to retire into Beaun, and put himself under the protection of queen Catherine of Navarre, mother of Henry IV. of France, and, if he did not like that country, to withdraw into Holland or England. It was clearly computed from hence, that a man who placed his hopes in heretics (tho' he could hope protection from none else) could never be in his heart a good catholic. To fish out, therefore, this latent heresy, the inquisitors thought fit to transfer him to their prison without the city of Saragossa. This produced a revolt, which the bishop of Tervel, who was then viceroy, quieted, by taking Perez out of the prisons of the inquisition, and sending him back to the prisons of the chief justice ; but the marquis of Almenara, the king's minister, was so rudely handled by the populace, that he died.

*Delivered by the people of Arragon,
which draws on them the king's indignation.*

THE inquisitors, having engaged all their friends to support them, constrained the viceroy to deliver up the prisoner to them again ; and, having assembled about two thousand foot, to cover this great enterprize, they attempted to carry it into execution, which excited a fresh insurrection, and in this there perished about one hundred persons, some of them gentlemen. However, as the soldiers could not be brought to act against their countrymen, or rather against their country, the people prevailed, and set Antonio Perez at liberty, who very prudently withdrew into Beaun<sup>2</sup>. In the midst of these disputes, the chief justice of Arragon, Don Juan de Lanuza, died, and was succeeded in that high office by his son. The people, upon certain intelligence that Don Alonso Vargas, with a body of 6000 men, was advancing, by the king's command, in order to punish this opposition to his will, insisted upon the assembling an army for protecting the liberties of Arragon, and obliged the young chief justice to issue commissions for that purpose; but most of the nobility, being become dependent upon the court, or willing to obtain favours by sacrificing that constitution which had made them great, either acted against the commons, or affected to appear neuters. The chief justice himself would have retired, if the people, who suspected it, had not restrained him. Don Alonso Vargas, who was himself an Arragonefe, no sooner appeared with his troops before Saragossa, than the magistrates went out to meet him, and, when he had taken possession of the city, the chief justice, Don Juan de Lanuza, returned with the duke of Villa Hermosa and the count de Aranda. Don Alonso caused them all three to be arrested, and, by the king's express order under his hand, directed Don Juan's head to be cut off upon a scaffold the same day*. In the opinion of all sensible people, the blow that deprived him of life, extinguished the liberties of Arragon. As to the other two noblemen, they died in separate prisons, under prosecutions for high treason; but their heirs making it fully appear, that they only made use of that popularity which their great probity and unblemished characters had given them to quiet the first commotions, and had no share at all in the last, they were, by a solemn sentence, declared loyal and faithful subjects<sup>b</sup>. This end had the troubles of Antonio Perez, who in a tedious exile, in which he was driven to great necessities, survived his mother and most of his enemies (B).

<sup>2</sup> Obras, Relaciones, et Cartas, d'Antonio Perez, Memoires historiques, politiques, critiques, et literaires, par AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE, History of the sad catastrophe of Antonio Perez, secretary of state to Philip II. king of Spain, by MICHAEL GEDDES.

1591.

THE

* GEDDES'S Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. ii. p. 398. BOURDEILLE, Sieur de BRANTOME, Memoires des Grands Capitaines Etrangers.
<sup>b</sup> CABRERA.

(B) We have said so much in the text of Antonio Perez, and the fortunes and misfortunes of that great minister are in general so well known, that we shall insist here only on a few particular points that have hitherto in some measure escaped the public notice, and which, in conjunction with his own writings and the common histories, will give the reader a true idea of the most singular character perhaps that the world ever saw. It is certain, that his intimacy with Donna Anna de Mendoza y la Cerda plunged them both into misfortunes.

This

*Intrigues of Don Philip to disturb the peace of France,
and procure the*

THE king Don Philip was still very intent upon his projects in France; but finding it very difficult to supply the leaguers with money, in proportion either to their demands or to their wants, he formed a project, which shews his abilities as a politician. Pope Sixtus V. had amassed prodigious sums of money, which he laid up in the castle of St. Angelo, under pretence of employing them, if it should be necessary,

This lady was princess of Eboli, equally remarkable for her accomplishments and her passions. She had a high genius, lively wit, and exquisite beauty; she was at the same time very ambitious and very gallant. The mistress, as the world said of Philip II. and the mistress too, if the same authority may gain credit, of Antonio Perez. She is said to have been in love with the power of the king, and the person of the secretary (1). The king's jealousy had no share in their disgrace; the princess always retained a great power over that monarch, notwithstanding she always corresponded with, and affected great attachment to Perez, who, thro' his long exile, still held a place in his master's esteem. This appears in part from the king's will, but more clearly and with better evidence in the memorial which Don Baltazar Zuniga drew up for the information of his nephew the Condé de Olivarez, in which he expressly affirms, that Perez was the faithful servant of the king, though disgraced, tortured, and banished, and kept his secret among his enemies, in spite of the threats, the arts, and the gifts, employed to extract it from him (2). He had a great affection for his wife, as appears from the elegant Latin epitaph he wrote for her; but he had his gallantries notwithstanding; and we are told, that Henry IV. of France hinted to him one day his surprise, that he should be so much the slave of a woman that had but one eye. Perez answered with emotion, she set the world on fire with that; if she had preserved both, she would have consumed it. We are not at the bottom of this history, which had a large share in his misfortune; he kept up his Spanish haughtiness in the midst of his wants, and would give the title of excellency only, not highness, to the count of Soissons, the duke of Guise, and other princes. Though he was a beggar, he was very intimate with queen Elizabeth's favourite the earl of Essex, and no less with M. de Villeroi, the French secretary of state, to whom those letters were addressed, which are intitled, To a friend; but he quickly lost his credit with queen Elizabeth and Henry IV.; and perhaps it would have been as well if he had not preserved it with their ministers. He died at Paris in 1611, in mean circumstances; for though he had many great qualities, he wanted oeconomy (3).

(1) Herrera, Cabrera, Nani. (2) Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, p. 257. Anecdotes de Philippe II. p. 153. Vie d'Antoine Perez, Secrétaire & Faveur, &c.

(3) Memoires Historiques, Critiques, Politiques, & Littéraires, par Amelet de la Houffaye, tom. i. p. 242—262.

against the infidels; but Don Philip suspected rather it was ~~crown for~~ intended for the conquest of Naples. His immediate success ~~the in-~~ for Urban VII. died so soon, that the king had it not in his ~~santa-~~ power to practise upon him; but Gregory XIV. being raised to the pontifical throne, he ordered his ambassador to acquaint him how much it was in his will, and how little it was in his power, to support the holy league in France; and, as a proof of his sincerity, desired leave to sell some of the church-lands in Spain for so good a purpose. This, he knew, the Spanish cardinals would labour to prevent; but, that they might not seem to have less zeal for the church than their master, they suggested that the treasures laid up by pope Sixtus might as well be employed against heretics as against infidels; in which they prevailed, and no less than three millions were this year issued for the service of the league<sup>c</sup>, which the Spanish faction in France placed to the account of king Philip, tho' not a penny of it came out of his pocket. But the duke of Mayenne, desirous of knowing what his catholic majesty's sentiments really were, sent the president Janin to Madrid, to discover them, where he found the king so fully persuaded of his title to France, that, in his discourse, he frequently made use of these terms, My city of Paris, my town of Orleans, my port of Rouen, which by no means pleased that minister, tho' he dissembled it. At length he was plainly told, that the king looked upon the infanta Isabella as the heiress of France; that he was inclined to marry her to the archduke Ernest, and, in consideration of the zeal and fidelity of the catholic league, in raising them to the throne, he was content to give them the Low Countries<sup>d</sup>. At this very juncture, the council of sixteen took upon them to offer the crown of France to the infanta, provided she espoused the young duke of Guise, who was just escaped out of prison. It was from these propositions, and the slender supply of ten thousand crowns a month, which the king promised the duke of Mayenne, that the president took occasion to make the best terms he could with Henry the fourth<sup>e</sup>. The English had this year a fleet upon the coast of Spain, under the command of the earl of Cumberland, and another squadron under lord Thomas Howard at the Azores, which, but for the intelligence they received from the former, had been surpris'd by Don Alonzo Bazan; who had the honour, however, of taking the Revenge, commanded by Sir Richard Greenfield, whose name Ferreras has

<sup>c</sup> HERRERA, BAVIA:
DE MATTHIEU.

<sup>d</sup> Histoire de France, par PIERRE
<sup>e</sup> THUANUS.

hispaniolized into Campo Verida; the only ship of war the Spaniards took from queen Elizabeth. But this saved the plate-fleet; the best part of which, however, together with the prize, perished by a storm in their return to Spain, where, notwithstanding, Don Alonso was received in triumph<sup>f</sup>.

A new insurrection in Arragon, attended with fresh acts of severity.

THE next year the unfortunate Arragonefe, who had been obliged to take shelter in the principality of Bearn, believing that the severities which had been exercised at Saragossa must have spread universal discontent through the kingdom of Arragon, they, with such succours as could be procured from the queen of Navarre, resolved to make an irruption into that kingdom; in which possibly they might have met with some success, if one of the queen's ladies of honour had not betrayed them to the viceroy Don Alonso Vargas, who posted troops there with such propriety, that Don Martin de Lanuza, who commanded the refugees, was surprised and beat; almost as soon as he entered the kingdom. He had, however, the good fortune to escape himself; but Don Diego de Heredia, Don Francisco Ayerbe, Don Judn de Lima, and Don Diego Perez, were taken, and executed, together with numbers of an inferior rank; and an expedition that was made into Catalonia by the Bearnois was not more successful<sup>g</sup>. Don Philip, upon this, published an amnesty, in which, however, were excepted Antonio Perez, and twenty others by name, all who were in prison, or under prosecution, and such as might be objected to by the inquisition. Upon which the Arragonefe said truly, that the king had sent them a very handsome suit of cloaths, but that it would fit nobody. Soon after, he convoked an assembly of the states at Tarragona, which was held in his name by the archbishop of Saragossa, and which, when they had curtailed some of the privileges of the kingdom, and done other disagreeable acts, the king meant to honour with his presence. The household of prince Philip being settled, the king, though somewhat indisposed, set out for Navarre; but, in his route, was taken so ill at Estrella, that it was believed his life was in danger. He recovered notwithstanding, through the strength of his constitution, and, as soon as he was able to bear the fatigue of travelling, proceeded with the prince to Pampeluna, where he was received with all apparent marks of joy, held an assembly of the states, in which the prince Don Philip was ac-

<sup>f</sup> CAMDEN'S Annals, CABRERA, HERRERA, FERRERAS.
<sup>g</sup> MAYERNE TURQUET.

knowleged his heir apparent. Having left an able architect to finish the castle, he returned through Arragon, and was present at closing the assembly of the states at Tarragona, where, upon his giving orders to Don Alonso de Vargas to leave the kingdom with his troops, excepting only a detachment that was to guard the inquisition, he obtained a free gift of seven hundred thousand livres, of that country money <sup>d</sup>.

His projects with regard to France were now at a crisis. He had a strong body of forces in Bretagne, and had directed the duke of Parma, who had gained so much reputation the year before by raising the siege of Rouen, to enter France a third time, to countenance the general assembly that was to be held at Paris for the choice of a king. That nothing might be wanting to facilitate his design, he caused ingots of gold to be carried by land to Namur, to be coined there into a million and a half of ducats, the best part of which were to be distributed amongst the deputies to the assembly, where the duke of Feria was to assist in his name, and to demand the duchy of Bretagne for the infanta Isabella, to which he asserted her right was indisputable, since that duchy came to the crown of France by an heir female, whose immediate direct heirs was his deceased queen, and consequently his daughter by her. The duke was also to support the interests of the duke of Guise, who, in case he was elected king, was to marry the new duchess of Bretagne; but, previous to this, he was to use his utmost endeavours to procure the election of the infanta, and to consent to the other measure only in case of necessity. These fine-spun schemes were broken by a variety of accidents. The duke of Parma died at Arras, where he was assembling his forces; upon which the troops mutinied; and a great part of them disbanded. The duke of Feria quarrelled with the duke of Mayenne; and the Spanish ministers were so scrupulous in parting with their money, that they were not able to carry any considerable point in the assembly; so that if the king persuaded himself, as some think he did, that his daughter would have been this year declared queen of France, he must have been much disappointed <sup>i</sup>. The Spanish historians tell us <sup>k</sup>, that Don Alonzo Bazan, with the gallies under his command, took several English ships that had made themselves masters of two of the plate fleet at the islands of the Azores; but an author of our own <sup>l</sup>, who was at that time in Spain,

The king insists upon the incontestable right of the infanta Donna Isabella.

<sup>d</sup> HERRERA.<sup>i</sup> P. DANIEL.<sup>k</sup> HERRERA.<sup>l</sup> Sir Wm. Monson's Naval Tracts.

affirms,

affirms, that Don Alonso might have done it, if he had followed the king's orders ; but that, by pursuing his own notions, he failed, was disgraced for it, and never recovered the king's favour any more.

Manages with great address, and obtains a large free gift from, the states of Arragon.

1593.

THE king Don Philip employed a great part of the spring in taking the best measures possible for quieting the minds of the people of Arragon, and at the same time provided for the security of that kingdom, by disposing his troops in such a manner on the frontiers, as to put a speedy end to any commotion that might be excited, in hopes of abolishing the concessions made in the last assembly of the states, in prejudice to their old constitution. He sent likewise a squadron of ships from Biscay, to support the leaguers in Bretagne; in the prosecution of which enterprize they engaged some English ships, by which both sides were losers ; but the Spaniards carried their main point of preserving what they had acquired in that country, which gave great uneasiness to queen Elizabeth <sup>m</sup>, on account of its situation. The king held a chapter of the order of the golden fleece, for the installation of his son the prince Don Philip, in which the collar was given to the duke of Infantado, the marquis de Villena, and Don Pedro de Medicis, a young Moorish prince, whose name was Muley, son to Muley Mohammed, the de-throned king of Fez and Morocco, who came privately to the king's court, and declared that he did it with a desire of becoming a Christian. After due precautions taken to be secure of his sincerity, he was baptized, and the king not only gave him appointments suitable to his birth, but also made him a knight of St. Jago, and grandee of Spain <sup>n</sup>.

Hen. IV. of France becomes a catholic, which breaks all the plots of Spain and the league.

HENRY IV. of France, having declared himself a catholic, broke all the measures of the league, and brought over at once all who had any sincere inclinations to restore the peace, and revive the honour, of their country <sup>o</sup>. The catholic king, in a manner little suitable to his great prudence, as even the Spanish historians confess, persisted in the pursuit of those projects that were now become impracticable, and had so much influence at Rome as to engage pope Clement the eighth to delay the absolution which he had demanded by the duke de Nevers, and perhaps might have done more, if a French priest had not honestly and boldly said to that pontif, Holy father, your predecessor Clement VII. lost England by gratifying the emperor Charles V. have a care therefore that you do not lose France by pushing too far your complai- sance for Philip II. This, and other remonstrances, wrought upon the pope; but as for the king, tho' he might at that time have made very good terms with Henry, he continued obstinate in his own measures, and in lavishing vast sums to no purpose, while his affairs suffered at home and abroad through the debts and difficulties that were by this means brought upon his administration P. In the Low Countries; the principal nobility refused to acknowledge the count de Fuentes, whom he had appointed their governor; so that the management of public affairs was left to count Peter Ernest de Mansfield, who had been appointed his deputy by the duke of Parma; and this visible declension of his grandeur on all sides, tho' it had no effect upon his behaviour, is thought to have affected the king's mind, and to have increased his infirmities 9.

<sup>m</sup> CABRERA, MEZERAY, P. DANIEL.

<sup>n</sup> HERRERA.

<sup>o</sup> CATHERINGT, LOUIS MAIMBOURG, MEZERAY.

THE friends of the Spaniards in France had prevailed upon the duke of Mayenne to remove the count de Belin from the post of governor of Paris, and to bestow it on the count de Brissac, whom they looked upon as an irreconcilable enemy to the king; and so perhaps he might have been, if they had not procured him this post, which enabled him to make his peace with his master, by putting the capital of his dominions into his possession. He managed this affair with such secrecy, that, while the army of France entered on one side of the city, the duke of Feria, with about four thousand Spanish troops, marched out of the other. There is no doubt that Henry might have attacked, and probably cut them to pieces; which, however, he was so far from attempting, that he sent them a safe-conduct, and offered them an escorte r. The king Don Philip, having sent his nephew the archduke Ernest, with the title of governor, into the Low Countries, the French king made him some propositions of peace; and, upon his declining them for want of proper powers, he sent an agent to Madrid with as little effect. Hostilities were still continued by the English at sea, and, by their assistance, the French were enabled to recover several places in Bretagne.

To heighten the perplexities of Don Philip, a Turkish fleet, under the command of the basha Zigala, appeared very unexpectedly on the coast of Calabria, where they committed most horrid outrages; and having acquired a vast booty, and a multitude of slaves, returned in triumph to Constantinople s. This year died Don Gaspar de Quiroga, Calabrian.

The city of Paris taken, and the duke of Feria, with the Spanish garrison, retires.

1594.

A Turkish fleet unexpectedly ravages the coast of Calabria.

archbishop of Toledo, a person equally beloved and revered, and who had opposed, as far as he was able, most of the measures that had brought the king into distress. He was a great oeconomist, and died immensely rich, but without making any disposition of his effects, which were therefore claimed by the pope. It is probable this might have met with some opposition, if, at the same time the claim was made, the pontif had not declared his intention that one-third should be employed in works of piety, that another should be paid into the royal treasury, and the remainder belong to the apostolic chamber, which was executed without any dispute. The king, upon the demise of this prelate, recalled the archduke Albert from the government of Portugal, where the administration was committed to five regents; and, upon the archduke's arrival in Spain, the king gave him the rich see of Toledo, to the great joy of his mother, tho' she had no interest in his promotion; for tho' he treated her with great civility and respect, yet it was believed he never forgave her the defeating his father's scheme of causing him to be elected king of the Romans.

An attempt made to set up an impostor
for Don Sebastian detected and punished.

THE king, having received the news of the death of the archduke Ernest, governor of the Low Countries, appointed Don Pedro Henriquez de Toledo de Fuentes to succeed him for the present, intending that government for the cardinal archduke Albert, who, for that reason, was not consecrated to his see, tho' he took possession of it by proxy, and appointed Garcia Loyasa his administrator, who, upon his resignation, became his successor. Henry IV. of France, believing that he could receive no greater injuries than he had done from Don Philip, declared war against Spain, and took proper measures, with the assistance of the queen of England, to make his power felt, where his friendship had been despised. There happened this year, or rather there was finished this year, a very singular and almost incredible transaction in Spain. At the time king Philip made himself master of Portugal, amongst other ecclesiastics, who were in the opposite interest, there was one father Michael de los Santos, an Augustine frier, who had been vicar-general of his order, chaplain to Don Sebastian, and confessor to Don Antonio. He was a man of learning and sense, and yet took such liberties in his discourse, that the king found it absolutely necessary to remove him out of Portugal; upon which he caused him to be seized, and sent him to Madrigal, where he made him confessor to a monastery of nuns of his own order, amongst whom was Donna Anna of Austria, his niece. Father Michael took notice there of one Gabriel de Spinoza, at that time a pastry-cook, a native of Toledo, but a foundling, who had been bred a velvet-weaver, who went as a soldier when the king sent the duke of Alba into Portugal, and, having carried away a young woman from that country, took up the trade he then followed for a subsistence. This man father Michael engaged to assume the name of Don Sebastian; and as he could not have a more able master, and as a great deal of time and pains were spent in giving him instructions, there was scarce ever an impostor who acted his part with greater dexterity. The next thing father Michael did was to introduce him to Donna Anna, who, through reverence of her spiritual guide, prejudice in favour of a man who did all he could to render himself agreeable to her, and through want of experience, was easily brought to believe that he was really the person he represented. Being flattered that a dispensation from the pope might enable her to share his throne and his bed, she gave him some jewels of great value to furnish him with money; and, in disposing of these privately at Madrid, he was apprehended for a thief, and, at the time he was seized, declared the truth, that he was a pastry-cook in Madrigal, and that the jewels belonged to the princess Anne of Austria. But, soon after he was confined, a packet was intercepted, directed to him from Madrigal, in which the title of majesty being given him, it was immediately carried to the king, and orders thereupon sent to confine Donna Anne to her cell. The share father Michael had in this business came soon after to be understood; upon which he was made prisoner, and the decision, with respect to him, left to the pope's legate. Gabriel Spinoza at first confessed freely, but afterwards retracted; however, being carried to Madrigal, and confronted both with the princess and the friar, the two men being put to the question, acknowledged all. The issue of this matter was, that Gabriel de Spinoza was condemned to suffer death; to which he submitted with great reluctance. Father Michael, after being degraded by order of the nuncio, was delivered over to the secular arm, and hanged. He is said to have died very penitent, and to have confessed that he intended to make use of the pretended Sebastian to excite a rebellion, and, if possible, to bring about a revolution in Portugal; after which he was to be removed, to make way for Don Antonio. As for the unfortunate princess, she was removed to another convent of the same order; and very closely confined during the remainder of her life *.

<sup>t</sup> CARRERA, LUIS DE BAVIA.      <sup>u</sup> ANTONIO CARNERO.
<sup>w</sup> MEZERAY, P. DANIEL, CAMDEN'S Annals.

1595.

The Spaniards revenge themselves on the Turks for pillaging Calabria.

TOWARDS the end of the month of August, the cardinal archduke and archbishop Albert set out for the Low Countries, vested with full powers to treat and conclude a peace with the French monarch; for as Don Philip could not prevent his being absolved by the pope, he at length abandoned the design of making the infanta a queen, and contented himself with what was in his power, resigning to her the Low Countries; a resolution which, if it had been earlier taken, might have produced those effects that were now expected from it in vain †. Don Pedro de Toledo, captain-general of the gallies of Naples, in conjunction with Don Pedro de Livo, general of the gallies of Sicily, made a descent at Patrass in the Morea, at the time of the fair, where they took from the Turks a booty to the value of 400,000 ducats, and brought away many rich merchants, whom they ransomed at a very high price. This year the English had a strong squadron in America, under the command of Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake, who both died there, after doing much mischief to the Spaniards, but with little advantage to themselves ‡.

Island and castle of Cadiz attacked and taken by lord Howard and earl of Essex.

AGE and infirmities had by degrees broke the spirit of king Philip; so that, notwithstanding the natural loftiness of his temper, his confidence in his own strength, and conceit of his superior policy, he had a strong inclination to peace, and was even disposed to make some sacrifices for obtaining it; yet, partly from the slowness of the Spanish councils, and partly from that inactivity into which he was now fallen, he did not pursue his new measures with that vigour which was necessary to have procured them success. He had intelligence of an English fleet and army preparing to invade his dominions, and he would persuade himself that the place aimed at was Lisbon; upon which he ordered all his strength thither. But this fleet, commanded by the lord admiral Howard and the earl of Essex, had, in reality, no other view than attacking Cadiz, and destroying there the fleet outward-bound to the Indies. They were very fortunate in all respects; for they brought the first news of their own arrival, and found the Spaniards miserably unprepared. Don Juan Portocarrero, who commanded the gallies in the bay, provided in the best manner he was able for the defence of the forts, and the security of the merchantmen; which, however, proved to very little purpose. The English attacked them with their small ships, as the depth of water did not permit them to use the large ones, and shewed more concern to outstrip each other in getting in than about the resistance with which they might meet. The passage being forced, the frigates, instead of taking shelter under the castle of St. Philip, run ashore on the other side, by which the men escaped. The galleons were either taken or burnt; the gallies had the good luck to get out, by the breaking down of a bridge, which the English somewhat imprudently had quitted. This, however, put it out of the power of the duke of Medina Sidonia either to relieve the place or favour the retreat of those who were in it; so that the earl of Essex stormed and took it; but the admiral landing to second him in that design, the fleet of merchantmen got up the bay, which otherwise might have been all taken; to prevent which the duke ordered them to be set on fire. The English remained in possession fourteen days, and tho' they ransomed the place for one hundred and twenty thousand ducats, the adjacent country could not raise the money; so that they carried with them their hostages. The Spanish authors are divided as to the value of the plunder; some say it amounted to four, and others say to eight millions, and six millions more perished at least on board the fleet<sup>a</sup>. This struck such a terror along the coast, that the inhabitants every-where abandoned it; so that the English landed at Faro in Algarve, burnt and plundered it, carrying from thence the library of the famous Jerome Osorio, and afterwards searched the harbours of Corunna and Ferrol, where they would have burnt the king's ships, if they had found them. The loss they sustained was great, the dishonour greater; the king felt both, and, with much difficulty, assembled a fleet and army to revenge it, by invading England. The high steward of Castile, Don Martin de Padilla, commanded both; but it was so late in the season before they sailed, that they met with a violent tempest at sea on the 27th of October, by which forty sail of ships were destroyed, and the shattered remains of the fleet forced into Ferrol<sup>b</sup>. In the summer, pope Clement VIII. sent his legates, cardinal Medicis to Henry IV. and father Bonaventure, general of the Observantines, to king Philip, to mediate a peace; and this was the step for which the king had waited, that the negotiation might be opened with the greater honour; whereas it might have been ended with much more 1596.

* MAYERNE TURQUET.

† CABRERA, FERRERAS.

‡ MAMBRINO, ROSEO, CANTEMIR, CAMDEN'S ANNALS.

<sup>a</sup> HERRERA, VANDER HAMMEN, CAMDEN'S Annals, MAY-
ERNE TURQUET. <sup>b</sup> CABRERA.

advantage two years before. In the mean time the archduke Albert sustained the reputation which the count de Fuentes had acquired in the Low Countries, by taking Calais and Ar-dres from the French, and the island of Hulst from the Dutch, which afforded some, tho' but a small, consolation for what had happened in Spain <sup>c</sup>.

The surprisal of Amiens delays the peace with France for a whole year.

THE peace with France would have been sooner concluded by a year, if it had not been for an unexpected piece of good fortune, or at least so it was esteemed, which happened to the Spaniards. This was the surprisal of the city of Amiens in Picardy by Hernando Tello Portocarrero, an officer of a small stature, but of a most enterprising genius, accompanied with great firmness of mind, and a perfect knowledge of the military art, as it then stood. The archduke Albert put him upon, and supported him in, this expedition; the success of which threw the city of Paris into a general consternation, and embarrassed Henry IV. extremely, who had still the duke of Mercoeur and other chiefs of the league to contend with, and was but upon indifferent terms with the protestants. The king saw that peace was not to be made upon reasonable terms till that place was retaken, which he caused to be blockaded immediately, besieged it afterwards in form, and commanded there in person. The archduke Albert marched with an army of 25,000 men to its relief, and approached it so unexpectedly, that the advanced guards of the French army had probably been beat, or at least forced to raise the siege. But taking time to form his own troops, he afforded that leisure to Henry which was necessary to remedy this disorder; and then it was thought unadvisable to risk a battle; so that, in September, the place was surrendered upon honourable terms; and the negotiations of the peace were in earnest resumed <sup>d</sup>. About the same time his catholic majesty made known to the archduke Albert his resolution with respect to his marriage of the infanta, and the cession of the Low Countries, and sent him full powers to demand in marriage for the prince Don Philip the daughter of the archduke Charles of Austria <sup>e</sup>.

Providence defeats a second time an invasion in-

THE war with England continued as warm as ever. Intelligence had been received there of the invasion that was intended the year before, and that this was still the aim of his catholic majesty. To prevent this, Elizabeth equipped a very strong fleet, with a numerous body of troops on board, to block up or burn the Spanish armada in their own ports.

<sup>c</sup> La Vie de Clement XI.

<sup>d</sup> AUBERTUS, MIRÆUS.

<sup>e</sup> GONZALEZ DE CESPIDES Hist. del Rey Phelipe III.

A terrible tempest having dissipated this fleet almost as soon tended up as it put to sea, the original scheme was laid aside, and the on Eng- earl of Essex, with the best part of the fleet, and as many land. of the troops as were judged necessary, sent to reduce the Azores; in consequence of which it was thought impossible that they should miss the plate fleet. But this fleet was in the first place to visit the coast of Spain, which they did in a hasty manner, and then continued their route to the islands: thus Don Martin de Padilla had an opportunity to come out of Corunna with his ships and forces, which gave the Spaniards great hopes, and indeed great probability, of success; but when they were within thirty leagues of the English coast, they were so roughly handled by a storm, that the fleet was intirely dispersed; and every ship, being obliged to shift for itself, they put back in a most shattered and distressed condition into different ports of Biscay; so that, as the Spaniards themselves confess, through the immediate and apparent interposition of Providence, all their attempts to the prejudice of England were frustrated, and turned to their own loss; but if the Spaniards were unlucky in their intended invasion, they were very fortunate in repelling the intended invasion of the islands. Don Gonçalez Vaez Continho, who was governor of the island of St. Michael, drew the whole force of that island to Punta Delgada, where he threw up such strong retrenchments, that the English were obliged to leave him, and go to Villa Franca, from whence the earl of Essex supposed he could have marched by land to Punta Delgada, which upon trial he found impracticable. But what was still worse than miscarrying in their conquest, they, thro' some misunderstanding amongst their officers, suffered the plate-fleet to escape almost unhurt, tho' it fell in with them, by which the Spaniards received a supply of ten millions of dollars, which had otherwise gone into their enemies pockets, and would, in all probability, have been employed in military operations against them: these observations are the more certain, since in these the best English and Spanish writers agree <sup>1597.</sup>.

THE conferences at Vervins for a peace between the crown's Peace con- of France and Spain began on the seventh of February, under cluded the mediation of the pope's legate, cardinal Medicis; but the with the plenipotentiaries of Spain were named by the cardinal arch- crown of duke, in virtue of the full powers that had been granted France at him by the king. They demanded that the duke of Savoy Vervins. should be included in that treaty, and, with some difficulty,

f CAMDEN'S Annals.

* CABRERA.

carried that point; but when they made the like demand in favour of the duke de Mercœur, it was absolutely refused, which occasioned some delay; but the duke having made a separate peace with the king, that difficulty was removed. Many others were started, but by the firmness and address of the cardinal legate, who knew very well that, notwithstanding the high and harsh language that was sometimes held on both sides, the French monarch and the cardinal archduke were equally desirous of peace, it was at length concluded and signed on the second of May, to the satisfaction of both monarchs. This famous treaty consisted of 34 articles, which in the main were very near those of the treaty of Chateau Cambresis, two only excepted; for, by the first, all places taken were to be restored, which was intirely in favour of France; and, by the 23d, Henry reserved all his rights to be discussed in an amicable way, or in the course of justice, by which was understood his title to the kingdom of Navarre. On the other side, Philip preserved his rights, and those of his daughter the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, to be discussed in like manner; and these were supposed to respect the duchies of Burgundy and Bretagne<sup>h</sup>. It is very remarkable, that as all the restitutions were on the side of the Spaniards, who were possessed of Blavet in Bretagne, and of Calais, Ardes, Montulin, and several other places in Picardy, the archduke sent the duke of Arscott, the admiral of Arragon, count Aremberg, and Don Lewis de Velasco, to be hostages for the evacuation of these places, as well as to be witnesses to the king's swearing to the peace, which he did in the presence of the cardinal legate on the 21st of June, and the archduke did the like at Brussels, in the presence of marshal Biron, on the 27th of the same month<sup>i</sup>.

The death
of Philip II. and the perplexed
state of affairs at the time.

THE archduke having received his uncle's orders to go into Germany, in order to conduct the archduchess Margaret through Italy into Spain, he, in the first place, resigned his hat by a letter directed to the pope, which was delivered by the archbishop of Besançon. He also resigned the archbishoprick of Toledo, which was bestowed on Don Garcia de Loyasa, who was preceptor to prince Philip; and then, in virtue of the renunciation made by the king, on the sixth of May, at Madrid, and of full powers granted him by the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, he received the oaths of the states, and those of the duchy of Brabant, who were the first, upon the 10th of August. All this was done with a view to conclude his marriage, while the king was yet alive, from an apprehension that some doubts or difficulties might arise on the part of his successor <sup>k</sup>. All this diligence, however, was ineffectual in this respect; for the king declining daily, thro' a complication of distempers, caused himself to be removed from Madrid to the Escorial, not without great difficulty, and against the advice of his physicians, to whose representations the king answered with great firmness, that they would have the trouble of carrying him thither when he was dead, and they might as well do it while he was alive. He was much better after his arrival there for some days; but then he relapsed. Upon his death-bed he gave a paper of instructions to the prince his son, to whom he recommended the infanta, calling her the joy of his heart, and the delight of his eyes. He ordered some state-prisoners to be set at liberty, and, amongst the rest, the wife of Antonio Perez, upon condition that she retired to a monastery. At length, with great marks of piety, as the Spaniards say, and, in the midst of the most excruciating torments, he breathed his last, on Sunday the 13th of September, about five in the afternoon, in the seventy-first year of his age, and in the forty-second of his reign <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> Corps Universel Diplomat. tom. v. p. i. p. 561.
BERTUS, MIRÆUS, HERRERA.

<sup>i</sup> AUBERTUS.

THERE is scarce any character in history that has been more frequently examined, or more severely censured, than that of this prince, who, though magnified by some Spanish historians as another Solomon, under whose form he is represented in a statue at the entrance of the Escorial, where Charles the fifth is adorned by the sculptor with the robes and the crown of David; yet others have more fitly compared him to Tiberius; and, while his panegyrists held him forth as a model for princes, those who criticised his character described him as the mirror of tyrants. Without partiality or prejudice, we will offer the reader a few observations drawn from facts. He was stiled Philip the Prudent, and with justice; for he was in all things a politician. Those who magnify his piety, by which they mean his zeal for the church of Rome, seem thereby to offer an exception; but they only seem to offer it; for Philip was only a political bigot. When Philip began his reign, he was only upon bad

<sup>k</sup> HERRERA, CATHERINOT, AUBERTUS, MIRÆUS, EMANUEL METELEN, GABRIEL CHAPUYS Histoire Generale de la Guerre de Flandres. Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. v. part i. p. 573.

<sup>l</sup> CABRERA, HERRERA, CAMPANA, BOURDEVILLE, SIEUR DE BRANTOME, MAYERNE TURQUET, FERRERAS.

terms with the court of Rome; he was therefore no persecutor in England, but shewed rather a compassion for those that suffered here for their sincerity in the faith. He introduced and subjected the Spanish church to the decrees of the council of Trent, but it was in his own way, and by his own authority; and though, through his whole reign, he was pressed to banish the Morescoes for the security of religion, his constant answer was, You must find some other way; for this is impracticable. The truth of the matter is, the church was the great instrument in his government, and he made great use of churchmen in his administration; and thus his zeal is accounted for on political principles. In point of system, if ever a modern prince aimed at universal monarchy, it was Philip II. He was disappointed in his schemes; but those schemes were equally bold and well-contrived. He was near being king of the Romans; he bid fair for making his daughter queen of France; and his projects for the conquest of England were defeated by Providence, but by competent judges were never derided. As his plans were very extensive, so he had great fertility of invention, and was never at a loss for expedients to piece them together again when broken, till his treasure and his power were equally exhausted, and then as he began, so he ended, his reign, with endeavouring to establish peace. In his domestic administration, he has been justly commended for encouraging and promoting men of abilities; but he depressed the nobility too much, and therefore he advised his son to a contrary course, that of caressing the grandees, and curtailing the revenue and power of the clergy; and this he did from his observation, that new men were turbulent, and, being raised from nothing, nothing could content them. It is very certain that he had not much affection, and less of pity, in his composition; but it is as certain that he has been represented as more cruel than he really was; for however severe he might be when his scheme of policy required it, he was never wantonly so, and could not therefore be said to delight in blood.

His conduct in domestic affairs, and personal character.

IN private life he was vicious, and therefore his pretences to religion were certainly political; for true piety appears in the conduct of a man's life; and is not to be taken from exterior actions, which may have another motive, and must have it, when, with high pretensions to piety, a person is corrupt in his morals. He had great haughtiness in his nature; and it was said, that tho' in his person and his complexion he resembled the Flemings, his temper and behaviour were intirely of the growth of Spain. Those who had audience dience of him, spoke upon their knees, which he excused from the lowness of his stature, pretending he did it to avoid being overshadowed by those who addressed him. He not only held the nobility in subjection, but at a distance; and, to qualify these apparent signs of pride, he was very easy of access to persons of meaner rank, but without departing from his dignity, unless he might be said so to do in conversing familiarly with peasants. He used the like condescension to churchmen, to his ministers, and to the ladies. He acquired by habit such an equality of temper, that success, or the want of it, made no alteration in his behaviour. He was never reputed brave, but he had a great firmness of mind; and tho' less active than his father in his person, who executed all his great designs himself, yet he was at least equal to him in abilities; for he gave his enemies more disturbance by the factions and insurrections he excited by his intrigues, than the emperor had ever done by his arms. Upon the whole, his ambition and his policy made him great and terrible during the major part of a long reign; but at the same time it made him odious, and exhausted his power. He saw this when it was too late, subscribed to the advice given by his father, and penned a censure of his own conduct for the use of his son. It is now time to see what effect this had upon a young prince, to whom, with his crowns, his father left the best counsels he could devise, but who with all this could not bequeath him his capacity.

S E C T. XVI.

The History of the remaining Monarchs of Spain, of the House of Austria; viz. Philip III. Philip IV. and Charles II.

THE prince Don Philip of Spain, at the time of his accession to the throne, was in the twenty-first year of his age*. He had received a good education, under the care of Don Garcia archbishop of Toledo, was sincerely virtuous and pious, and, as a noble Italian historian says, exceeded most of his subjects in moral virtues; but was very defective in those great qualities that, because they are necessary too, are generally expected in kings. In the last years of his father's life he had assisted in the council for foreign affairs, and shewed somewhat of ambition in demanding the key from Christopher de Mora, the ensign of his office, while his father was yet living, at whose command it was delivered to him, and he gave it immediately to Don Francisco de Rojas y Sandoval, marquis of Denia, his favourite, to whom he not long after gave the title of duke of Lerma <sup>c</sup>. It was at first doubted what turn things would take at the new court, where several great affairs seemed to be but half-finished; but it very quickly appeared, that the king and his minister were disposed to moderate measures; in consequence of which the peace with France was ratified, as also the cession of the Low Countries in favour of the infanta <sup>d</sup>. The archduke Albert proceeded in his journey to Germany, and, with the duchess of Gratz and the archduchess Margaret, her daughter, travelled slowly, and with great pomp, through the territories of the state of Venice, where all imaginable honours were paid to them, into Italy. Pope Clement VIII. being at Ferrara, where, on the 15th of November, by virtue of a procuration from king Philip, he espoused the archduchess, the nuptial blessing was given by the pope; and at the same time the Spanish ambassador, who was the duke of Soffa, acting as proxy for the infanta Donna Isabella, the pope celebrated that marriage also; then taking Mantua and Milan in their way, the archduke brought her to Genoa; where, however, the rough weather detained them till the spring <sup>e</sup>.

Measures of the young king on his accession, and conclusion of his marriage.

* GONZALES DE CESPIDES Historia del Rey Don Phelippe III.

• Historia della Repubblica Veneta, di BATT NANI, Procuratore di Santo Marco.

The duke,
his favourite
while prince, declared his prime minister, and bated on that account.

1599.

IN the beginning of the ensuing year died the archbishop of Toledo, which, besides the loss of so great a man, had a great influence on the court, as it put the king intirely into the hands of his favourite, who quickly procured the primacy of Spain for Don Bernard de Rojas y Sandoval, bishop of Jacca, who was soon after honoured with a hat from Rome <sup>f</sup>. The new queen, attended by the archduke, landed towards the latter end of March in the kingdom of Valentia, and the king repairing to that capital, the marriage was solemnized and consummated on the 18th of April. Amongst other signals of public joy on this occasion, there were two statues erected, one representing Jupiter, and the other king Philip, with a globe resting on both their shoulders; the meaning of which was obviqus enough; but soon after an inscription was pinned upon the god, containing these words, This Jupiter is the duke of Lerma; which shewed how early the public envy began against this minister <sup>8</sup>. The old ministers and governors of provinces, who had been bred in his father's maxims, excited the duke of Savoy to persist in keeping the marquisate of Saluces from the French king, and promised him the support of Spain, provided he would send his three children thither to be educated, or, as the duke understood it, to serve for hostages. They prevailed also with the king to assemble great forces at Lisbon, and afterwards to bring troops and a fleet to Corunna. He also demanded of Henry the fourth, that his fleet might be received into the harbour of Brest: all which was to alarm queen Elizabeth, as if he intended an invasion; which compliment the queen returned by preparations of the same kind, though there does not seem to have been any real intention on either side <sup>h</sup>. The archduke Albert having married the infanta, the king conducted them to Barcelona, where they embarked on the 7th of June for Genoa, from whence they proceeded by land to the Low Countries, where the archduke no sooner arrived, than he acquainted queen Elizabeth, that he had full powers to treat of peace; and commissioners being appointed on both sides, they met at Bologne by consent of the French king <sup>i</sup>. The Dutch sent a strong fleet to the islands, which did a great deal of mischief, being the first time that they had acted at sea alone against the crown of Spain; but, as auxiliaries, they had assisted in taking Calais <sup>k</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> Sieur de BRANTOME Memoires des Grands Capitaines Etrangers. <sup>d</sup> P. DANIEL. <sup>e</sup> Vita CLEM. VIII.

GRIMSTON'S Continuation of MAYERNE TURQ. <sup>f</sup> LUIS DE BAVIA,

THE count de Fuentes, who had formerly made so great a figure in the Low Countries, having now the government of Milan, not only with very full powers, but with a million of pieces of eight at his disposal, raised a great army, which drew the eyes of all Europe upon him; but, however, he did little, and what he intended was never perfectly understood. It was apparently designed to support the duke of Savoy, and to alarm the French king; but there were various secret designs, and one of them the surprising of Marseilles, which miscarried <sup>l</sup>. At last, that these prepa-

1600.

Attempts unsuccessful against
the Moors,and intrigues of the countde Fuentes in Italy.

<sup>8</sup> GRIMSTON'S Continuation of MAYERNE TURQ. <sup>h</sup> CAMDEN'S Annals.

<sup>i</sup> Historical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Brussels, extracted from the MS. state-papers of Sir Tho. Edmondes, knight, ambassador in France, by T. BIRCH.

<sup>k</sup> Sir W. MONSON'S Naval Tracts.

<sup>l</sup> Historia della Republica Veneta, di BATT NANI.

1601.

rations might at least seem to have some end, a fleet of 70 gallies was sent, under the command of Doria, against the Turks; but tho' the basha Zigali's fleet was much inferior, that of Spain did nothing. While the treaty was concluding at Bologne, his catholic majesty assisted the rebels in Ireland; and it is said that king Philip obtained from the infanta, his sister, a resignation of her rights, whatever they were, to the crown of England. The next year Doria made another attempt upon Algiers with as little success <sup>m</sup>. On the 22d of September the queen was happily delivered of the infanta Donna Anna at Valladolid, to the great joy of the Spaniards, some doubts having been entertained whether there would be any issue of this marriage. The duke of Savoy was so much of this opinion, and so fully persuaded that the infanta Isabella would die childless, that he began to relish the proposal that had been made of sending his sons to be educated in a country, to the crown of which they might one day become the heirs <sup>n</sup>. The count de Fuentes still continued his armaments and his intrigues; and tho', in the end, he seized the marquisate of Final, and published a pompous manifesto on that occasion, yet the world was now well enough apprised of his true design, by the discovery of marshal Biron's conspiracy, in which he was very deeply embarked, and which, as it ruined his own, so it very much lessened his master's reputation, more especially as he still maintained his government, and continued still to pursue the same dark designs <sup>o</sup>.

Compliments the king of England upon his accession, and concludes a peace with him.

UPON the death of queen Elizabeth, the court of Spain sent over Don Juan Baptista Taxis, count of Villa Mediana, to compliment king James upon his accession, and, under that pretence, to make some overtures of peace. This was judged to be the more necessary, as they were not ignorant in Spain that Henry the fourth of France was very desirous of engaging the new king in that general confederacy he was forming, in order to pull down the power of the house of Austria <sup>p</sup>. In the summer, another expedition was made by sea against the infidels without success; and, in the autumn, died the empress Mary of Austria, who was the daughter, daughter-in-law, wife, and mother, of five emperors <sup>q</sup>. She was exceedingly beloved by the people, and respected by

<sup>m</sup> CAMDEN'S Annals.
MAYERNE TURQ.
di BATT NANI.

<sup>n</sup> GRIMSTON'S Continuation of HISTORIA della Republica de Veneta, <sup>p</sup> P. DANIEL, Memoires de Duc de TULLY. <sup>q</sup> GRIMSTON'S Continuation of MAYERNE TUR-QUET.

the royal family in Spain, which was now increased, by the arrival of the prince of Piedmont, and his two brothers. The year ensuing his catholic majesty sent Don Juan Fernandez de Velasco, constable of Castile, his ambassador and plenipotentiary into England, to complete the negotiation which was already far advanced. Commissioners being appointed on both sides, the peace, notwithstanding many obstacles that were thrown in the way, was at length concluded, signed, and proclaimed, in the beginning of August, to the great satisfaction of the court and the people<sup>r</sup>. It was the more acceptable, as the misunderstandings still continued between Spain and France, which frequently discovered themselves by the imposition of heavy duties on merchandize on one side, and prohibitions of commerce on the other. Besides, it was hoped that this treaty would make way for a peace with the new republic of the United Provinces, of which the archdukes were very desirous, and which could not but be pleasing to the catholic king, who paid a monthly subsidy of 300,000 ducats for the support of a war which produced him neither honour or profit.

1604.

As it was requisite to send an ambassador extraordinary to The prince Spain, to see the peace sworn to by his catholic majesty, the Don Philip king of England made choice of the earl of Nottingham for lip born, that purpose, who was so well known to the Spaniards by to the great joy of the king and all his subjects. the title of the lord high admiral Howard. He was received with all possible demonstrations of respect, and had the good fortune to find the court in raptures of joy on the birth of the prince Don Philip, which happened on the 8th of April; 1605. of the ceremonies of whose christening he was a spectator, the duke of Lerma and the infanta Donna Anna being sponsors. Soon afterwards the king swore to the due performance of the treaty, the cardinal archbishop of Toledo reading the oath, and the king kneeling, with his hands upon the gospel; which we the rather mention, because such ceremonies are now out of use<sup>t</sup>. The next year the queen was delivered of the infanta Donna Maria, and the first steps were made towards the negotiation of a truce with the states, tho' it did not take effect. The finances were in great disorder, and the measures that were taken to redress this were far from answering the end. In the mean time, those who hated the favourite, and who had pursued him with envy from the very beginning of the reign, multiplied their imputations, and magnified every unlucky accident that happened into a crime. Amongst other things, it was alleged, that the very duties upon oil and wine had brought in three-and-twenty-millions: that the fleets from the Indies were more richly laden than in his father's time; and that, notwithstanding this vast income, the king's coffers were empty. All this confirmed the minister in his former sentiment, that the maxims of the last reign were to be abandoned, the sums squandered on spies and pensioners retrenched, and an end put to the war in the Low Countries without delay; since, besides the immediate expences supplied to the archduke, it obliged the crown of Spain to put annually a strong fleet to sea, and subjected them to losses in the Indies, which it was alike impossible to prevent or repair<sup>t</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> CAMDEN's Annals of King James I. Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. iv. part ii. p. 32. <sup>t</sup> GRIMSTON's Continuation of MAYERNE TURQUET.

*Assembly of
the states,
in which was regulated the great business of the coinage.*

1608.

THIS situation of things made it requisite to call an assembly of the states, which was opened on the 16th of April, and continued sitting the best part of two years at Madrid, to which city the court was returned on account of the inconveniencies that were felt from their residence at Valladolid. There, on the thirteenth of January, the infant Don Philip was acknowledged heir apparent to his father, and the nobility sworn to his succession<sup>u</sup>. In this assembly also the tender point of the duke of Lerma's administration was brought upon the carpet; and this was doubling the value of the copper-money, in which without doubt he was ill advised. The famous jesuit Mariana, who has rendered his name immortal by his history of Spain, shewed himself a judicious politician and an unbiassed patriot, in an admirable treatise upon this subject; but, having drawn the minister's picture in very strong colours, and exhibited his master likewise as an indolent and inactive prince, who looked into nothing with his own eyes, but left all to the discretion of those, or rather to the disposition of him he trusted, he was arrested, and remained a prisoner a full year<sup>w</sup>. The states, however, more intent upon finding a remedy for the evil, than the punishment of those who perhaps erred in judgment, passed a law on the 22d of November, in which they provided, that the silver

<sup>t</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, Historia della Republica de Veneta di BATT NANI. <sup>u</sup> Idem. <sup>w</sup> BERNARD GIRALD. PATAVINUS pro senatu Veneto Apologia, sive de Justitia Decreti, quo senatus Venetus adolescentes ditioni quæ subditos ad Jesuitarum scholas accedere interdixit; deque conditionibus quibus Jesuitæ redditum at Venetos videntur impetrare posse. Nicolas Antonio Biblioth. Hisp. tom. i. p. 560.

which

which should come from the Indies in the two next flotas should be coined in the manner therein prescribed ; and that all the silver which came for the future should be likewise coined into such money as should be most expedient ; for, upon raising the value of the copper coin, it had been poured in upon them from abroad, and their silver suddenly swept away, as if it had been by enchantment. The duke, however, prosecuting his scheme, procured a truce for eight months to be concluded in the Low Countries, which made way for that by which the states of the United Provinces were acknowledged as free and independent *.

THIS great event was brought about in the succeeding Truce year by the interposition and under the mediation of the <sup>with Hol-</sup> kings of France and England, who were guaranties of this land, <sup>when</sup> treaty, by which a truce was concluded for twelve years be- <sup>the Dutch</sup> tween his catholic majesty, the archduke, and the states ge- <sup>republic</sup> neral. It was signed on the 9th of April, and ratified by <sup>was owned</sup> king Philip at Segovia in the month of June <sup>as a free</sup> y. This pro- <sup>state.</sup> duced a new clamour against the duke of Lerma, who was <sup>1609.</sup> certainly the author of this measure, which those who hated him considered as highly dishonourable to Spain. We need the less wonder at this, since the Spanish ambassadors employed in making the peace with England always talked as if they had really believed it in the power of their monarchs to have reduced the seven provinces whenever they pleased by force, if they had not been restrained either by maxims of policy, or their unwillingness to exterminate the inhabitants of their hereditary dominions. To justify this, they compared the countries under the dominion of the states, and their forces, with the vast territories and proportionable power in the hands of their catholic majesties. But, whatever they might say, their statesmen certainly saw and knew that the contest for the Low Countries had cost Spain infinitely more than they were worth, and was such a continual drain of treasure, troops, naval stores, and ships, as wore out gradually the strength of the monarchy. The duke of Lerma, therefore, in all appearance, had nothing to answer for in this respect, since he sacrificed only phantoms and chimeras to the real interests of the crown, by taking the single method that could be taken to rescue the Spanish nation from

* Card. BENTIVOGLIO, della guerra di Flandra.      † Les Negociations de M. le President JEANIN sur la treve des Pays, EMANUEL METELEN, Histoire des Pays Bas, fo. 658. Recueil des Traités de paix, de treve, de neutralité, de confederation, d'alliance, et de commerce, &c. par FRED. LÉONARD; tom. v.

a consumption by which she was already brought very low, and by which, in the space of a few years, she must have been utterly undone; while most of her neighbours, who bore her no good will, were daily augmenting their strength and wealth, and, as she had good reason to fear, meant, at a proper season, to make her sensible that they had not forgot the injuries they had received from her in the days of her prosperity. But haughtiness, and a high conceit of their own power, are so natural to the Spaniards, that, how just soever the minister's motives might be, this step, of all others, was most likely to offend them; nor is it at all improbable that some of those, who best understood the reasons upon which he acted, from their envy to his high fortune, represented his actions in the worst colours.

The Mo-

rescoes,

after much

delibera- tion, are expelled

out of the kingdom of

Valentia;

ALL the measures that had hitherto been taken to secure the tranquillity of Spain, notwithstanding the number of Morescoes that were still left, could not dispossess the greatest part of the clergy, and many prelates, of whom the archbishop of Valentia was the chief, of their apprehension, which they represented in the strongest terms possible to the cardinal archbishop of Valentia; and he, on the other hand, prepossessed his brother the duke of Lerma in such a manner, that, in spite of all the arguments which could be used to the contrary, a resolution was taken to expel them out of that kingdom, and the edict for that purpose subscribed by the king, at the Escorial, September the 11th, 1609<sup>2</sup>. In this edict it is said, that the Moors had invited the grand signor, and the king of Fez and Morocco, to make a descent in Spain with a great army, promising that they should be received by 50,000 good infantry, who were as zealous Mohammedans as any in Asia or Africa. Some say that they were charged with a conspiracy to massacre all the old Christians on the Good Friday following; but this was only a contrivance to give a colour to this barbarous and inhuman expedient, which was vigorously opposed by all the nobility and men of property in the kingdom of Valentia, who foretold, and the event justified the prediction, that, with the Moors, industry, wealth, and plenty, would be banished from their country. But all methods possible being tried to alter the king's resolution without effect, the decree was put in execution, and the Moors at several times transported out of that kingdom into Barbary, where however his catholic majesty interposed his interest to procure them a good reception, and the best settlements that could be given them<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>2</sup> JAIME BLEDA, Chronica de los Moros de Espana, History of the expulsion of the Morescoes out of Spain in the reign of Philip III. by MICHAEL GEDDES, vol. i. p. 115.

AFTER the execution of this decree in Valentia, the same <sup>and soon</sup> method was taken in Andalusia, Granada, Murcia, Catalo- <sup>after out</sup> nia, Aragon, both Castiles, Estremadura, and La Mancha, <sup>of all the</sup> not without two rebellions, in each of which the Moors chose <sup>provinces</sup> themselves a king, which were not suppressed without a great <sup>of Spain</sup> effusion of blood, and putting both those miserable pretend- <sup>in general,</sup> ers to royalty to death<sup>b</sup>. A great number of children under <sup>and with-</sup> the age of seven years were retained and sold; but his catholic majesty declared they should not remain slaves, but that those who bought and educated them should have their service as many years after they reached the age of twelve as they had bought them under it, and that then they should be free. By this expulsion of the Moors, some say that no less than a million of persons were sent out of Spain, which is probably beyond the truth; but it seems on all hands agreed, that there were eighty thousand families transported, and, according to the most moderate calculation, this rather exceeded than fell short of six hundred thousand persons<sup>c</sup>. We must, in common justice to the understanding of the king and his ministers, suppose there must have been very strong reasons for so bold and so extraordinary a measure (A). However,

<sup>a</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, GEDDES'S Miscellaneous Tracts.

<sup>b</sup> JAIME BLEDA.

<sup>c</sup> AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE.

(A) The chief reasons for expelling the Moors, or rather Morescoes, by the clergy, and more especially by the cardinal of Toledo and the archbishop of Valentia, might be reduced to three. First, That they were obstinate and incorrigible infidels, upon whom preaching did no good, and all instruction was cast away; and therefore it was to no purpose to bear with them any longer. Secondly, That they were traitors to the state, rejoiced at the misfortunes of the king's arms, wished well to his enemies, held a constant correspondence with them, invited them to invade the kingdom with a promise of their assistance, and, as often as they had opportunity, sold or betrayed people into the hands of their countrymen the Moors of Barbary; so that, from a principle of self preservation, it was requisite to remove them. Thirdly, That as they perpetually increased in their numbers, and began in many places to have great interest with their neighbours, there was great risque of their corrupting the manners and faith of the Christians, and no less hazard of their becoming strong enough to attempt recovering ever, the bad effects that were foreseen quickly discovered themselves; and though the duke of Lerma secured by it the recovering their dominion over them. It was therefore absolutely necessary, to prevent these evils, to remove them without delay. To these the barons opposed their answers. They said, that, if most of the Morescoes were Mohammedans at the bottom, it was owing to the want of learning and application in the clergy, to the wrong methods they took in converting them, to the impolitic and irreligious distinction between old and new Christians, to the want of suitable encouragements, and, above all, to the violences and cruelties exercised upon them by the inquisition. As to their treasons, they were at best chimerical; that, for their correspondencies with France, England, and Holland, they were downright falsehoods, equally void of probability and evidence; and that, as to the persons they sold or betrayed to the Moors, they would undertake to ransom all captives at the expence of the Morescoes. In answer to the danger and hazard that might attend keeping them, they suggested the immense benefit that arose from their labours, the improbability of unarmed and dejected people rising and conquering a warlike and potent nation, and the dreadful indigence that must follow from expelling a million of industrious people to gratify the resentment, and still the fears, of avaricious and timid priests, some grudging the pensions they paid out of their revenues to those appointed to instruct them; and others weary of their pastoral functions, and willing to sell their flocks, which in conscience they were bound to feed (1). After all, it must be allowed, that the clergy spoke truth, when they affirmed the bulk of the Morescoes to be Mohammedans; and it must be also allowed they spoke sense, in affirming it to be very dangerous to let them remain in Spain if they continued so. On the other hand, the nobility were in the right as to the advantages derived from them, and no less, so in the consequences they foresaw from the loss of them. Both spoke from their interests, and neither had any thing else in view (2). The king and his ministers, therefore, ought to have given full credit to neither; they should have employed their thoughts in devising how to make these people true Christians, which would have put an end to the dispute (3). This might have been done by separating them, by establishing an order of monks, whose sole business it should have been to convert them, by erecting schools for teaching their children the Castilian tongue, by bestowing upon those children employments in distant parts of the country, and by sending the clergy in his interest, it lost him the best part of the nobility, and was always considered as the worst action in his whole administration. In the month of November the strong and important fortress of Larach in Africa was betrayed to the Moors, through the treachery of some Marascos, which, though in itself of great loss, was of some use in allaying that general discontent which had been excited by their expulsion, though it was as likely to have been occasioned by the resentment of that measure as by any other way<sup>d</sup>.

(1) The History of the Expulsion of the Morescoes out of Spain, among the Miscellaneous Tracts of Dr. Michael Geddes. (2) Gonzales de Cejpedes, Historia del Rey D. Phelippe III. p. 391. (3) Las Memorias de Phelipe de Comines, con Escolios propios de Don Juan Vitrian, li. 13.

It is affirmed by some who were present in the Spanish court, that the news of the deplorable death of Henry the fourth of France was very acceptable there; which is the less strange, since there is nothing more certain, than that his demise at this juncture concurred precisely with their interests<sup>e</sup>. The Spanish ministers, or at least their emissaries, had given this prince perpetual disturbance and repeated provocations ever since the peace of Vervins, which was concluded from necessity rather than choice; and it was well enough known, that though he bore this, he bore it with great reluctance, and with a purpose of being revenged as soon as it was in his power. At the very moment he was murdered, he was on the point of taking the field against the house of Austria in the empire, and, it was believed, had concluded a secret treaty with Charles Emanuel duke of Savoy, one of the ablest, but one of the most unquiet, princes that age produced, by which he promised him his assistance in conquering Milan from the Spaniards. If, therefore, the war had broke out in Italy as he intended, at the same time that it began to blaze in the Low Countries and in Germany, the system framed by Charles the fifth, and upon which Philip the second wrought throughout his long reign, would in all probability have been demolished in a few months, since the deep submission shewn both in Germany and in Italy was the pure effects of dissimulation, and, upon the first appearance of a force sufficient to protect them, the con-

the French king held a very favourable event for the house of Austria.

<sup>d</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, JAIME BLEDA, wood's Memorials, vol. iii. p. 176.

<sup>e</sup> WIN-

apostates into Barbary, instead of leaving them at the mercy of the inquisition (4). But the duke of Lerma was governed by his brother, and the king by the duke and his own superstitious fears, which were wrought on by pretended miracles and fictitious prophecies (5).

(4) Geddes's Tracts, vol. i. Espana, del M. F. D. Foussea.

(5) Justa, Expulsion de los Moriscos de

1610. sealed enemies of the house of Austria would in both have thrown off the mask. However, upon the first intelligence of the French king's death, the court of Spain went into mourning, and a minister was dispatched to Paris with compliments of condolance to the queen regent, as well as to put her in mind of the marriages that had been proposed; the flatterers of both courts gave out, that the match of the eldest infant and the young king Lewis was intended by Providence, because they were born within a few days of each other; and this embassy was very kindly received, and the proposals of marriage were promised to be brought upon the carpet, notwithstanding the French nation appeared in general very much against it<sup>f</sup>. The duke of Lerma was extremely satisfied with this, as it fell in exactly with his pacific disposition, and allowed him to proceed at leisure in his scheme of paying the king's debts, and bringing the finances into order, for which he was highly applauded by his creatures, and abused almost by every body else, upon a supposition that old demands could not be satisfied without a proportionable present to the all powerful benefactor by whom they were procured.

The demise
of the queen Donna Margaret of Austria,
and the suspicious
it occasioned.

QUEEN Margaret of Spain, who had an extreme attention to this marriage, a great influence over the king, and upon whom the German branch of the house of Austria chiefly relied, had the satisfaction of seeing herself the mother of three princes and as many princesses, when she was delivered of another son, Don Alonso, on the 22d of September, at the Escurial, which was celebrated with all possible demonstrations of joy; but these soon after were converted into mourning by the unexpected death of this princess on the third of October following<sup>g</sup>. A report prevailed some time after that she was poisoned, and very probably those who raised it cast the suspicion on the man in the world least likely to commit such a fact; this was Don Rodrigo Calderon, who was favourite at once to the queen and the duke of Lerma, and he had a prodigious influence, or rather command, over both; from which it was asserted, by those who had more wit than to believe it themselves, that he had enchanted them both. A certain prelate, however, assures us, that the queen was poisoned by the smell of certain perfumed pastils thrown into the fire, which the season rendered necessary in the chamber; and the fact is ascribed to the natural aversion which the Spaniards have to German customs, from which the queen would never refrain <sup>b</sup>. Be this as it will, as soon as the king appeared in public, it was given out on one side, that he was desirous of marrying the English princess Elizabeth, but to others it was pretended that he had thoughts of a princess of Savoy, which, with the proposed marriage of the prince of Piedmont to one of the infantas, flattered the ambition of duke Charles Emanuel extremely.

1611.

<sup>f</sup> P. DANIEL, GONSALES DE CESPIDES, Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. WINWOOD's Memoirs.

<sup>g</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. contenant ce qui est arrivé de plus remarquable en France et dans l'Europe depuis le commencement de son regne jusqu'à la mort de ce prince, par M. LE VASSOR.

THE queen regent of France, having made the necessary Reciprocal alterations in her council, ventured to avow the double marriages concluded with the court of Spain; and sent the duke of Mayenne to Madrid, to demand the infanta, at the same time that the duke of Pastrana was sent to Paris, to make the like demand of the princess Isabella, or Elizabeth, sister to king Lewis, for Don Philip, prince of Asturias; which ceremonies, though supported with all imaginable splendor, from the natural antipathy of both nations, were not agreeable to either, though the situation of their affairs rendered them very convenient, according to the sentiments of their politicians <sup>i</sup>. The Morescoes, so hardly dealt with in Spain, sustained this year two persecutions from those of their own religion. At Constantinople they drove the Jews out of the suburb of Pera, and attempted the like with respect to the Christians, for which they were chastised by the grand vizir. The city of Algiers being afflicted with famine, they turned out thousands of those poor creatures to starve, and put numbers of them to death. The murmurs of the people in Spain were in some measure silenced by the arrival of a plate fleet from the Indies with eleven millions on board <sup>k</sup>. 1612.

THE Spanish ministry, as much as their parts were slighted by their countrymen, had with great address perfected what Italy, and the French could never perform, that is, the intire subjection of Italy. Charles duke of Savoy could not brook this with patience; the Venetians saw it with concern; and the grand duke, though he felt but little of the yoke, was far from being easy under it. Pope Paul the fifth affected not to perceive it; and indeed the Spaniards occupied themselves the renewal of a proposition for a marriage in England.

<sup>b</sup> PAULI PIASECII Chronica gestorum in Europa singula iam.
<sup>i</sup> LE VASSOR, WINWOOD'S Memorials, GONSALES DE CES-PIDES. <sup>k</sup> CANTEMIR.

1613.

rather in forging and rivetting the chains of Italy, than in rattling them about people's ears, merely to make them know who were their masters. The death of the duke of Mantua, who left an only daughter, produced an explanation of this matter which the Spaniards did not expect or desire. Cardinal Gonzaga, brother to the deceased duke, laid aside his hat to place a coronet upon his head; and the duke of Savoy, having withdrawn the duchess dowager his daughter, surprised on a sudden the best part of the Montferrat, of his rights to which he had made a cession upon his daughter's marriage. The duke of Mantua, unable to defend himself, called in the assistance of his neighbours the Venetians, and the grand duke supplied him from a point of honour; but the governor of Milan received express orders from Madrid to oblige both princes to disarm, and to prescribe a peace upon certain terms, the most remarkable one of which was the marriage of the cardinal duke to his brother's widow. Both princes were displeased with this, as were indeed all the Italian states; but, after all, the cardinal duke wisely submitted, knowing that he had not a power to resist, and upon a presumption that his antagonist, who was stronger, would take the same steps upon other motives; so that he should lose nothing, and procure at the same time the protection of Spain, in which he judged right; for the duke of Savoy roundly refused to part either with his troops or his daughter, not doubting that he should be supported by France, in which however he found himself mistaken<sup>1</sup>. At this time the catholic king and his ministers continued to amuse the English court with distant and indefinite propositions. The princess Elizabeth was married to the elector Palatine, so that nothing more could be said on that head<sup>m</sup>. Henry, prince of Wales, whom they had often wished in Spain to espouse the infanta Donna Maria, was dead; and the loss of this prince put the Spanish ministers in mind, that when a match was mentioned between him and the infanta, of the disproportion between their ages. She was said to be a fitter match for the duke of York, in which they now concluded the English ministers had reason, and were for bringing this negotiation upon the carpet again, though all their purpose was only to amuse, since they knew the marriage was extremely odious in England, nor could it be more so there than it was to them.

<sup>1</sup> Historia della Repubblica Veneta di BATT NANI.    <sup>m</sup> Wilson's History of King James I.

THE military preparations of the Turks being very great, Duke of and no certainty at all upon whom the storm would break, Lerma's the Spanish ministers found themselves under a necessity of <sup>scheme for</sup> providing for the security of their coasts, and fitting out a <sup>supporting</sup> considerable fleet. By that time this was completed, it was <sup>the power</sup> known that the Turks had in view the attacking of Malta; <sup>of Spain</sup> but, before the Spaniards had leisure to regulate the affairs <sup>in Italy.</sup> of their succours, the grand signor laid up his fleet, and turned his arms against the Persians. Upon this, orders were sent to Don Lewis Faxarado, who commanded the Spanish fleet, to make a descent on Barbary, and to build a strong fort upon the gulph of Marmora, to prevent the pirates from taking shelter there, and disturbing from thence, as they had done, the coasts and the commerce of Spain. This, in the month of August, was happily effected; and, though it would scarce have deserved notice in the days of Charles or Philip his son, it was one of the most considerable successes of this reign<sup>a</sup>. The troubles of Italy still continued, though the duke of Savoy professed upon all occasions the most profound deference for his brother-in law, and actually sent his son, the prince of Piedmont, into Spain; but, having a secret understanding with the governor of Milan, it was sometimes war, sometimes peace, between them, notwithstanding very precise and clear orders were sent from Madrid. The great point he laboured to evade was, the disbanding his troops; for otherwise he was not very averse to the terms of peace that had been prescribed, more especially when he found the queen regent of France would not embark in this quarrel, out of respect to the house of Mantua, with a branch of which in France she had some measures to keep. On the other hand, the duke of Lerma, who was believed to have a personal prejudice against the duke of Savoy, and who, from the intire influence he had over his master, hindered him from proceeding farther than some general discourses in a scheme of marrying a princess of that house, resolved to ruin all his projects by sending a new governor into the Milanese, who should pursue his instructions punctually, and by making the Venetians feel the resentment of Spain for the succours they had privately given the duke, though they had taken part against him in the beginning of the quarrel. The sole view of the Spanish minister was, that an end should be put to these disputes by the interposition of Spain, without admitting the shadow of the emperor's authority, or allowing the French to interfere in the negotiation. In this respect he was jealous of his master's honour, but took care to second his dictates with the princes of Italy by an army of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, which he judged the most probable means of having them obeyed. Though he was not reputed the most subtle statesman, yet even his enemies allow, that this plan was well drawn, and conducted throughout both with prudence and spirit<sup>o</sup>.

1614.

<sup>a</sup> MARIANA, GONSALES DE CESPIDES, AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE.

Both the marriages solemnized with great pomp and splendor at Burgos.

1615.

He was prevailed upon, however, to trust Mendoza, the old governor, with the conduct of the campaign for this year, from various motives, of which this was none of the least, that, the double marriages being to take place, it was not so convenient that things should be carried with a high hand in Italy. He abated, however, nothing in his instructions, but left that intirely to the temper of him who was to execute them, and who, notwithstanding his superiority, having to deal with a prince of consummate capacity, made a confused kind of war, which he concluded as soon as he could by a perplexed peace<sup>p</sup>. In the mean time his catholic majesty went to Burgos, where, on the 18th of October, the marriage was celebrated by proxy between prince Philip of Spain and Madame Isabella, sister to the king of France. The same day was likewise celebrated the marriage of Lewis the thirteenth with the infanta of Castile, who two days before had renounced all her rights to the succession, in case her brothers died without issue, not only to her father's kingdoms, but even to the Low Countries<sup>q</sup>. On the ninth of November the two princesses were exchanged on the river of Bidassô. Affairs were at this time in such confusion in France, that the queen regent was forced to bring her son with an army to meet his bride, whom he received at Bordeaux, and was afterwards obliged to conclude a peace with the malecontents, in order to open a safe passage back to Paris; which peace proved very soon fatal to the marshal d'Ancre, who had the chief hand in the marriage, and to the queen herself, who was exiled to Blois<sup>r</sup>. As for his catholic majesty, he remained with the prince at Burgos till the arrival of Madame Isabella, and soon after returned with the court to Madrid. There the treaty of Asti, which had been concluded by the governor of Milan, was disclaimed, and a resolution taken to send Don Pedro de Toledo, marquis of

<sup>o</sup> Historia della Republica Veneta di BATT NANI, MARIANA.
<sup>p</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, LE VASSOR, PAULI PIASECII.

Villa Franca, to replace him in that government; a man of high spirit and great talents, who it was not doubted would re-establish the superiority of Spain, and give law to the princes and states of Italy. This the duke of Lerma thought indispensably necessary for the honour of his master's crown, and for the credit of his administration, which he knew was decried by the common people, at the same time that his authority was undermined, by those who were under all the ties and obligations that either the laws of nature or of society could establish, for the foundation of trust and confidence amongst men. He bore up against them, however; with courage, and opposed great prudence and long experience, as well as the interest he still had in his master, to the arts and intrigues of men who attacked him without any just cause, and were guided solely by the dictates of their ambition.

Don Pedro de Toledo, the new governor of Milan, quickly gave the duke of Savoy, and all who were interested in the treaty of Asti, to understand, that it was not to be the rule of his actions, farther than it was consistent with the glory of the Spanish crown, of which he took himself to be the sole judge. He applied himself with such vigour and diligence to augment his troops, and to dispose all things for the continuance of the war, that, notwithstanding he forbore committing hostilities, yet he perplexed the duke of Savoy much more than his predecessor had done at the head of a numerous army. The French king at first sent thither Monsieur de Bethune; and after him the marshal de Lesdiguières was sent to Turin, where he served the duke of Savoy effectually by his advice, and saved him by his assistance, which enabled him to resist Don Pedro when he came to attack him openly, as well as to defeat that back blow by which the governor of Milan expected to have undone him; for understanding that the duke of Nemours, who was of the house of Savoy, and who had been but indifferently used by the duke, was notwithstanding raising forces on his behalf in France, he, by promising him the investiture of Savoy, engaged him to change sides, and, when admitted into his country, to fall upon the duke with that army which had been raised partly with his money, and intirely for his service. But this treachery was discovered in time, and prevented. It was upon this that the governor of Milan, who had dissembled to give the duke of Nemours time to penetrate

Don Pedro de Toledo, marquis of Villa Franca, made governor of Milan.

1665.

* Historia della Repubblica Veneta di BATT NANI, MARIANA. LE VASSOR,

trate into Savoy, discovered his real intentions, and began the war, in which his superiority gave him some success; but the great courage and conduct of duke Charles of Savoy prevented his doing any thing that could be accounted decisive. The duke of Offuna, at this time viceroy of Naples, attacked the duke likewise by sea, and made some impression<sup>t</sup>. The Spaniards had also another quarrel with the Venetians, as auxiliaries of the archduke Ferdinand. This contributed to excite a general distaste to them and to the house of Austria, which was greatly augmented by the private views and bad designs of some great men, whose wickedness rendered a crown and an administration odious, though they had not the least concern in their intrigues, and must have suffered more by them than any other state whatever.

Strange

designs and daring practices of the Spanish
ministers
in Italy.

1617.

THE flame of war blazed higher this year in Italy than ever, and had spread much farther than ever the court of Spain intended, if the intrigues before-mentioned had not been discovered. There was at this time a triumvirate of ministers in that country, capable of embarrassing all Europe, and of sacrificing it too, for their own private and pernicious purposes. This triumvirate was composed of Don Pedro Gironne, duke of Offuna and governor of Naples, the marquis de Bedmar, who was ambassador at Venice, and the marquis de Villa Franca, governor of Milan. The first of these, under pretence of arming against the Turks, carried on a secret correspondence with them, at the same time that he held another equally dangerous with the marquis de Lesdiguieres, the design of which was to seize the kingdom of Naples, and to render himself independent. The second conducted those dark projects that were to have ended in the destruction of the city and republic of Venice, if they had not been discovered and prevented. The third seemed to meditate the conquest of Savoy, and actually made himself master of the strong fortress of Vercell, by which the duke was constrained to enter into an accommodation upon terms that were far from being agreeable to him. This, however, raised his character with the court of Madrid, who disavowed the conduct of the other two, and recalled the marquis of Bedmar immediately<sup>u</sup>. In the East Indies the war continued between the Dutch and the Spaniards and Portuguese, subjects of the same crown, of which we have treated in another place; and of which all we have here to say is, that Don Juan de Ronquillo having, on the 15th of April, gained a signal advantage at sea, the news of his victory were no sooner received in Spain, than it was celebrated with great demonstrations of joy, the duke of Lerma pretending, upon this foundation, to take such measures as should effectually secure the Moluccas; in which, however, himself and his successors were exceedingly disappointed; neither did the rejoicings that were now made contribute to support, as he was in hopes they would, his credit with the king, or restore him to the general good opinion of the grandees and of the people.

<sup>t</sup> LE VASSOR, GREGOIRE LETI, Histoire du Duc d'Offone, GONSALES DE CESPIDES, MARIANA. <sup>u</sup> Historia della Republica Veneta di BATT NANI.

As soon as it was known at the court of Madrid that the duke of Savoy was inclined to peace, it was very quickly concluded, even upon such terms as were approved, if not dictated, by the court of France; and express orders were sent to the marquis de Villa Franca to carry this treaty punctually into execution; which he obeyed, though with all the solemnity of a Spaniard, obliging the duke to take always the first step in the setting prisoners at liberty, in disbanding troops, and in the restitution of places; but himself no pain about that, when he found the marquis was to be depended upon, and that he performed things honourably, though he would perform nothing but in his own way. The disputes with the Venetians were also composed: and the eldest branch of the German line of the house of Austria being on the point of failing in the emperor Matthias, his catholic majesty, out of regard, and in order to support the grandeur of the family, consented to a general renunciation of all his rights to the succession of any part of the dominions belonging to that branch; and though some say, that, in consideration of this resignation, it was agreed, that the king should have a full and ample cession made to him of the whole country of Alsace, yet it does not appear that any such grant was ever made, or at least it is very certain that he never received any benefit from it: we may therefore justly assert, that his conduct in this respect was equally prudent and disinterested; for, if he had insisted upon these possessions, they would have added nothing to his power, and would have lessened that of the archduke very much. But we must now pass to the domestic concerns of his catholic majesty, and relate as succinctly as we can the fall of the duke of Lerma, who had hitherto governed his vast dominions with unrestrained authority,

• GONZALES DE CESPIDES, LE VASSOR.

thority; the king seeming to have no other will than that of complying with his minister.

The measures taken by the duke of Lerma, so secure his administration, prove in effectual.

It is generally agreed, that consummate prudence, rather than any sublimity of genius, was the characteristic of the duke of Lerma. It was this that rendered his administration peaceable and stable, and yet it is owing to this that he fell at last into disgrace. He discerned clearly, that the abilities of the duke of Uzeda his son were below the level of his own, but he had the manners and the polish of a court; he therefore intended that he should succeed him as the king's favourite, and he instructed him so well, and managed his design with such address, that it succeeded beyond his wish. His aim was, that his son should manage the court; but, for the cabinet, he made choice of his sister's son, the count de Lemos, a man of true parts, and every way fit for the great employment for which he was intended. But as he was himself in no hurry to retire, he placed the count de Lemos in the bed-chamber of the prince, that he might contemplate the rising sun, and rise with it. In this too he succeeded, for the count de Lemos gained the affections of his young master in a supreme degree. The duke's foresight went still farther; he cast his eyes upon Lewis Aliaga, a monk, of whose probity he had a great opinion, whom he made the king's confessor. The consequence of all this care and skill was, that his son and the priest conspired against him, and became his bitterest enemies: the duke of Uzeda could not pardon the contempt his father had shewn of his talents; the priest thought he had more to expect from a minister of his own making, than from the minister who had made him. The count de Lemos might have secured himself at least, if he would have joined in this scene of ingratitude, but he disdained it: he loved, he revered his uncle, and therefore removing him was the first step towards the fall of that great minister. The king signified to the count, that he should not pass his evenings at the prince's bed-side; and, his commands not being very punctually obeyed, he was forbid his presence, and removed from his employment*.

He is disgraced, and, for his own security, obtains a but from the pope.

THE duke de Uzeda and the confessor, as is usual in courts, cloathing their private views with the specious pretence of concern for the public, carried all the popular complaints against the duke of Lerma into the king's closet; in consequence of which, a committee, or, as they call it in Spain, a junta, was appointed to consider of the state of the nation; and they made a long and laboured report, in the very first paragraph of which they told the king, that Spain was on the point of falling to the ground, and ascribed all these misfortunes to the duke of Lerma and his administration; and yet a very able and a very impartial judge assures us, that there never was a favourite more mild and moderate than this duke; and that, while he held the reins of government, the public resembled his private conduct; it had not in it any thing striking or surprising, but it was without war, without taxes, and without oppression. The king, however, upon this report, by a short letter, dismissed the duke from his employments, and ordered him to retire; which he did on the 4th of October<sup>1</sup>, which was the feast of his patron St. Francis, and which, from the superstitious practice of those times, he had regarded as fortunate and propitious. He made some struggles to remain, that were unworthy of so great a man; but his prudence in procuring a hat from the pope a little before his disgrace, though he did not receive it till afterwards, was very commendable, since it covered him from those pursuits which the malice of his enemies, who had gone so far, would otherwise have carried farther<sup>2</sup>. On the 7th of December, the same year, died his brother the cardinal archbishop of Toledo suddenly, and, as some think, of the grief conceived at his brother's disgrace, which he had laboured all that was in his power to prevent<sup>3</sup>. The king determined immediately to give important preferment to the infant Don Ferdinand; but as that prince was very young, this design met with great opposition at the court of Rome, and it was not without a long and troublesome negotiation that it was at length brought to bear<sup>4</sup>. The duke de Uzeda, who succeeded his father, advised the king to shew himself to his subjects, and proposed, in hopes it would render his administration popular, that he should make a tour into Portugal, as the most effectual means of quieting the discontents of that nation, which were both general and great, but occasioned chiefly by the degeneracy of their nobility, who consumed in folly and luxury the vast revenues derived to them from the virtue and industry of their ancestors, which this visit of the king's was much more likely to increase than to cure.

* GONSALES DE CESPIDES.

1618.

<sup>1</sup> Anecdotes du Ministère du Comte Duc d'Olivarez, Historia della Republica Veneta di BATT NANI, VITTORIO SIRI, Memorie recondite.

<sup>2</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, GEDDES's Miscellaneous Tracts, Le Vassor.

<sup>3</sup> Anecdotes du Ministère du Comte Duc d'Olivarez, GEDDES's Miscellaneous Tracts.

<sup>4</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES.

*The rise,
fortune,
and fall, of Don Rodrigo Cal-
derona,
favourite
to the duke of Lerma.*

IN a short time after the disgrace of the duke of Lerma, his favourite Don Rodrigo Calderona, count of Oliva, was seized and imprisoned. The fortune as well as the fate of this man was very extraordinary. He was the son of a poor soldier and of a Flemish woman, neither of whom would ever have been heard of but for this son of theirs, who was a youth of pregnant parts; the duke, then marquis of Denia, took him under his protection, and afterwards into his favour. In the beginning of his fortunes, the young man was ashamed of his birth, and would have disowned his father; but he quickly effaced this fault, by receiving him into his house, and treating him there with the utmost respect and veneration. It has been remarked, as peculiar to the duke of Lerma, that he advanced his favourite as high as if he had been the favourite of a king: for he not only enabled him to raise an estate of an hundred thousand crowns a year, and procured him titles and honours, but he even allowed him to hope for a viceroyalty. These favours could not fail of exciting envy, which the haughtiness and impetuosity of his temper quickly swelled into malice, according to the prediction of his father, who frequently told him, that, his bark having so little ballast, if he continued to crowd sail at that rate, it would be overset by the first storm. The death of the queen and of prince Philip Emanuel of Savoy, with many other enormous offences, were charged upon him as the instrument of his master; but, after sitting for two years these accusations, they were found to have nothing in them. However, he was continued in prison, and, as we shall see hereafter, became the victim of that resentment which the abuse of his master's kindness had excited. It is supposed that this prosecution was drawn out into so great a length, partly to prevent his escape, and partly to keep up the odium that had been raised against the duke his master, and hinder his being restored to the king's favour.

His majesty makes a tour into Portugal, and a public entry into Lisbon.

ON the 22d of April the king Don Philip set out from Madrid, with the prince his son and the infanta Donna Maria, for Portugal, and, from the hour he entered that kingdom, saw nothing but splendor, joy, and obsequiousness. On the feast of St. Peter he made his public entry into the city of Lisbon, where the river was covered with vessels of all sorts, decorated with the most glaring and costly magnificence. There were no less than 32 arches of triumph in the streets; and such an amazing display of gold and jewels, that the king was obliged to prolong this shew for two days,

— Don JUAN VITRIAN, AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAIE.

that

that he might have time to behold all. He paid the Portuguese by his courteous and affable behaviour, and by saying, that he never thought himself so great a king before. He caused an assembly of the states to be held, in which the nobility swore to his son as heir apparent, and himself likewise swore to maintain their privileges, and to govern according to law. He remained at Lisbon for some months; and when he left Portugal, to return into Spain, he seemed to do it with reluctance. Yet the nation in general was not satisfied with his behaviour, for he did not appear so much in public as they desired, neither did he give so explicit an answer to their demands as they expected. The first was in reality owing to the principal motive of his coming thither, which was, a declining state of health; and the other to the influence of his new ministers, who were much afraid that the Portuguese would insinuate themselves into his affections; and were not at all pleased, that, in representing their grievances, they more than once insinuated to the king, that they did not in the least impute them to his majesty, but to those who had his ear, and who abused that confidence which he placed in them; circumstances that contributed not a little to heighten that distemper which the king had upon him, and which in fact was a deep melancholy, occasioned by the memorial which had ruined the duke of Lerma, and which had opened the king's eyes with respect to the miseries of his subjects, and to his own incapacity of relieving them <sup>d</sup>.

THE affairs of Europe, which had been tolerably serene Embar- during this reign, began now to be overcast. The affairs raised state of the empire were fallen into great confusion; the Bohe- of affairs, mi-ans had thrown off the yoke, and elected Frederick prince by which palatine for their king<sup>e</sup>; even the Austrians wavered in their the Spanish fidelity, and Ferdinand found himself besieged without and ministry is within Vienna. In short, the assistance of Spain, which had much per- always been expedient, was now necessary, to the German plexed. branch of the German of the family; and that which had 1619. been an uneasy burden became a heavy load; and, what rendered it the heavier, it was impossible to be laid down. In Italy the duke of Feria, who was sent to replace the marquis of Villa Franca in the government of Milan, found a league upon the carpet for circumscribing the power of the Spaniards; and, to defeat this, he set on foot such intrigues in Switzerland, as rendered his nation more odious and

<sup>d</sup> GONSALES DE CESPIDES, FARIA Y SOUSA.
son's History of King James I.

<sup>e</sup> WIL-

more insupportable to the Italians than ever <sup>f</sup>. The designs also of the duke of Offuna became so apparent, and the nature of his connections so generally known, that the only question at Madrid was, not whether he should be removed (for in that all the ministers agreed), but whether he would submit to be removed, or how another governor should be introduced, in case he was not disposed to give him place <sup>g</sup>. The Turks also had a powerful fleet at sea, which heightened the perplexity of this scene not a little. The honour of the crown of Spain required her having a fleet at sea likewise; but prince Philibert of Savoy, who commanded it, following his instructions very punctually, fought it with great earnestness, and, with equal dexterity, avoided fighting when he had found it <sup>h</sup>.

All with spirit, and find their efforts attended with considerable success.

1670.

As the Spanish ministers found the concerns of the monarchy in such a situation, that, without exerting themselves, they must necessarily fall into confusion, a spirit of vigour appeared, very unusual in their councils. Under colour of assisting the archduke Albert, great supplies were sent into Germany, and a numerous body of veteran troops under the marquis Spinola, who acted however in the name of that prince, and not of the king of Spain; which timely succours enabled Ferdinand to get the better of his competitor, and to over-run his dominions <sup>i</sup>. In order to assist him still farther, the old treaty of marriage was revived with the king of England, and mighty advantages proposed to recommend the match of the infanta Donna Maria with Charles prince of Wales; an alliance which king James had no one reason to wish, by which Spain alone could have been a gainer, and in which they were notwithstanding, from first to last, but very insincere <sup>k</sup>. The duke of Feria was encouraged and applauded, which induced him to spirit up the popish inhabitants of the Valteline to revolt from the Grisons, and, which was much worse, to massacre the protestants. This being performed, the Spaniards, as protectors of the catholic religion, erected several forts in that country, not so much to serve the interest of their new allies as their own. The situation of this narrow track rendered it of infinite importance, as it facilitated the correspondence between the two branches

<sup>f</sup> Historia della Republica de Veneta, di BATT NANI. GONSALES DE CESPIDES.

<sup>g</sup> GREG. LETI Histoire du Duc d'Offone.

<sup>h</sup> FRANC. CASTAGNINI della Vita del Principe Filiberto di Savoia.

<sup>i</sup> WILSON's History of K. James I.

<sup>k</sup> Historical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Brussels.

of the house of Austria, shut the Swiss out of Italy, kept the Venetians in awe, and perfected the plan laid down by the count de Fuentes for holding the Italian princes and states in a dependence that differed very little from subjection<sup>1</sup>. Cardinal Francis Borgia, being appointed viceroy of Naples, was introduced with silence and secrecy into the castle, which is one of the three fortresses that commands the capital, and by the thunder of the cannon from thence the morning after, the duke of Offuna had the first notice that his successor was arrived. He was a man of courage and abilities, as well as boundless ambition; but this stroke so surprised him, that, tho' he made some overtures, he was afraid to venture upon open resistance; and therefore resigned, though with a bad grace, what it was not in his power to keep<sup>m</sup>. The cardinal infant Don Ferdinand, the consent of the pope being at last obtained, took this year possession of the see of Toledo by proxy, the primacy of Spain being committed to a child of ten years old; which, whatever pleasure it might give the king as a father, could not be well reconciled to that character, of which alone he seemed ambitious, of being esteemed the most pious prince of his time<sup>n</sup>.

WHATEVER satisfaction might result to the ministers from the success of the last year, they were far from reviving, as it was hoped they might, the spirits of the king. He grew worse in the winter, and, at the coming on of the spring, he became so weak, that he clearly perceived he could not last long. He now expressed a great concern for that indolence and inapplication which had been the disgrace of his reign, which his father had predicted, and to which in truth he had contributed by an austere education, and which this very prince had copied in regard to his own son. He disapproved the seizing the Valteline, and gave orders upon his death-bed that it should be restored. In imitation of his father, he left in writing some notes and observations for the use of his son; but he left him, what made a stronger impression, his example of never being his own master, into which he was already fallen, and in which he persisted to his life's end. The king was given over by his physicians near thirty days before he died, which occasioned a variety of intrigues. Some of his ministers, either repenting of what was past, or through fear of what was to come, desired him to recall the duke of Lerma; to which he readily consented. Upon this, the count de Olivares, who was the prince's favourite, put his master upon a very extraordinary and a very hazardous action; for he engaged him to send an order to the duke of Lerma, requiring him to return to his own house as soon as it came to his hands, and where-ever it might find him. This, tho' he might have declined it, the duke obeyed, saying, with his usual prudence, that he was glad to be honoured with the first order of his master, that he might give his subjects an early lesson of submission to all his commands °. Philip III. expired in his palace at Madrid on the last day of March, in the forty-third year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign. He expressed much less firmness in his last moments than his father had done; which was so much the more strange, as his life was incomparably more innocent, since an indolent love of quiet was his great and almost only fault. He had by his queen, the archduchess Margaret of Austria, seven children, four sons and three daughters. Of these, Philip, who succeeded him, the infant Don Carlos, the cardinal infant Ferdinand, the queen of France, the infanta Donna Maria, who was afterwards queen of Hungary, survived him; but, notwithstanding this numerous posterity, he is said to have had no better prospect with regard to his family than in reference to his dominions, the thoughts of which embittered his last moments, and occasioned some complaints, which it is needless to repeat.

Death of Philip III. and circumstances attending it.

<sup>1</sup> Hist. della Republica de Veneta, di BATT NANI. <sup>m</sup> GREGORI Histoire du Duc d'Osune. <sup>n</sup> GONZALEZ DE CESPEDES.

His son
Philip IV.
succeeds,
and is intirely governed by count Olivares.

PHILIP the fourth, like his father, remained the subject of his favourite, after he became the sovereign of his people. This favourite, as we observed before, was Don Gaspar de Guzman, count de Olivares, a man of great parts and boundless ambition. He followed, though as we have seen it was not necessary, the orders sent by the prince, with another signed, the moment he became king, to the duke of Lerma, whom it overtook upon the road, and served only to convince him, that, in his first resolution, he had acted with prudence. The king discovered at first some sparks of spirit and genius, that were not long supported, and which if they were afterwards remembered, served only to persuade his subjects, that indolence, and not incapacity, was his principal failing. The count, by a dexterous management, raised a great outcry against the late ministry, and, under colour ° Anecdotes du Ministère de Conte Duc DE OLIVARES.

P Historia della Republica Veneta, di BATT NANI. FARRA.
SOUSA, LE VASOR, DON JUAN VITRIAN, AMELOT DE HOUSSEAU.

inquiring into it more strictly, the duke de Uzeda was removed, and his friend the confessor remanded to tell his beads in his own monastery. In this there was not much amiss, the world in general approving these sacrifices; but it was not so with another victim. Don Rodrigo Calderone, after being acquitted of all the great charges brought against him, was condemned for having knowledge of the death of two Spanish gentlemen, not over-clearly proved. He suffered on the scaffold; but he suffered with so much constancy, and yet with so much humility and resignation, that he attracted universal compassion. Great changes followed in the cabinet and the court. About the person of the prince the count scarce suffered any that were not his own relations; and, except his nephew Don Lewis de Haro, none of them were distinguished by their shining abilities. The minister had a great genius, and he did not care to be controuled.

In regard to foreign affairs, things were conducted in a A new manner, not very conducive to the honour of the new king. scheme of The late monarch, by a clause added to his will, had com- *politics in-*manded the prince his son to restore the Valteline. Introduced, In compliance with this, a treaty was concluded at Madrid with Monseigneur de la Bassompierre, in which all the proper stipulations were made for the restitution of that country, and or- which has long and lasting bad effects. ders for that purpose were to be sent to the duke of Feria, who knew how to execute, or rather not to execute, them, so as to keep the country; pretending a good will to restore it, if the catholic inhabitants might be preserved in the free enjoyment of their religion. But by this time the new system of the count de Olivares began to display itself; for having brought into public odium, and even under a kind of prosecution, the late ministry, for their pusillanimity in the management of affairs, it was become requisite at least, if not necessary, that new methods should be entered upon. These consisted in the concluding a strict league with the emperor, 1621; that, by his assistance, while France was torn with religious wars, and England amused with the false hopes of a marriage, the war in the Low Countries might be revived upon the conclusion of the truce, and both there and in Italy the authority of the crown of Spain rendered not only respected, but in a manner absolute. A great design, and not ill laid out, if all things had happened according to the apprehension of its author; but Providence disposing otherwise of events, his schemes were not attended with that success he expected. On the contrary, they produced a spirit of jealousy, which, in process of time, brought the Spanish monarchy to the brink of ruin.

<sup>1</sup> Historia de Don Phelipe IV. Rey de las Espanas, por Don GONSALEZ DE CESPIDES Y MENESES. Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. GEDDES'S Miscellaneous Tracts. BATT NANI.

*Resolution
taken to renew the war with
the states,
and to bridle
Italy.*

THE count de Olivares, who, under the veil of extraordinary modesty, concealed a self-sufficiency, that equalled, in his own opinion, the talents of Ximenes, would not seem to do any thing out of his own province; and therefore put his uncle Don Balthazar de Zuniga, who had been the king's governor, at the head of foreign affairs. He was in reality the very opposite of his nephew; for he had that genius to which the other pretended, but with all the modesty which the duke only affected. With all this merit, however, he suffered himself to be carried away with the count's notions, and concurred with him, against the sense of all the rest of the council, to renew the war with the Dutch, notwithstanding they had shewn a great disposition to prolong the truce, or even to convert it into a solid peace<sup>a</sup>. This strange measure, in direct opposition to the representations made by the archduke Albert, and most of the council, was far from being acceptable to the people. But they were better pleased, at least at the beginning, with the count's causing a new court to be set up, for squeezing those who had been in the management of the finances during the former reign, by which a great sum was brought into the treasury, and by the count's declaring, that, for the future, the public revenue should be applied only to public uses, and no gratifications or pensions granted upon any terms<sup>b</sup>. In Italy, the people of the Valtelline were still protected in their revolt, and the marquis Spinola, with the Spanish troops under his command, assisted the emperor against the protestants, while the negotiation of the infanta's marriage remained still on the carpet. By this doubleness in its behaviour, the Spanish court, by degrees, wore out the patience, and at length excited a resentment in all the great powers of Europe<sup>c</sup>.

1522.

*Unaccountable journey of Charles
prince of Wales to*

In order to repay the obligations they were under, or at least to acknowledge them, the German branch of the house of Austria did every thing that could be desired by the crown of Spain: the emperor, in particular, granted to king Philip the investiture of Milan, Final, Piombino, and other lesser fiefs in Italy; which heightened the jealousies of the

<sup>a</sup> Anecdotes du Compte Duc d'OLIVARES.
NANI.

<sup>b</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. BATT

NANI.

<sup>c</sup> BATT

princes and republics to such a degree, in conjunction with the court of the conduct of the duke of Feria, then governor of Milan, Madrid. that, under the protection of the crown of France, they 1623. formed a confederacy for the recovery and preservation of their freedom <sup>w</sup>. The war went on in Germany and the Low Countries, and consequently the treaty of amusement with England, notwithstanding the infanta had declared clearly to the count de Olivares, that, if it was concluded, she would retire into a monastery, and the king himself had sworn that he would never give the princess his sister to a heretic <sup>x</sup>. However, appearances were carried so far, that the English ambassador extraordinary, the earl of Bristol, and the Spanish ambassador, count Gondemar, seem to have been both deceived; so that, upon their assurances, Charles prince of Wales, attended by the marquis of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid on Friday the seventh of March, very unexpectedly, and their presence, in such a situation of things, must have been very unwelcome. To cover this as far as it was possible, all imaginable honours were paid him. The king, in all public places, gave him the right hand; all criminals not condemned, and all prisoners for debt, were set at liberty, the king paying their creditors, in honour of this visit. The intentions of the court were so well dissembled, though his royal highness saw his mistress but seldom, some say but once, that, after seven months stay in that court, he departed, under such a persuasion of their being in earnest, that, having left full powers with the lord ambassador Bristol, he deposited a private act of revocation, to be delivered to him when the bull from Rome should come, which, if he had been apprised of the true sentiments of the court, was altogether needless. However, the two favourites quarrelled to such a degree, that Buckingham told Olivares, he would serve the king of Spain in England at the risk of all that was dear to him, but for himself, he should always find him his greatest enemy; to which the count answered, without the least emotion, that he hoped he would keep his promise; and that, how far soever he went in the execution of his threats, he would forgive him with all his heart <sup>y</sup>. The pope too, that he might shew an equal strain of sincerity, after giving all imaginable proofs of his approbation of the match, directed a brief to the count de Olivares, in which he thanked him for his steady

<sup>w</sup> LE VASSOR, BATT NANI.
dotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.

<sup>x</sup> BATT NANI, Anecdotes
<sup>y</sup> WILSON's History

of James I. Sir RICHARD WYNN's Account of the Journey of Prince Charles's Servants into Spain, in the Year 1623.

attachment to the catholic cause, so clearly manifested by his defeating a measure so inconsistent with it as this marriage would have been. The whole transaction, when it came to be thoroughly understood, added England to the number of those great powers which studied to find out means for effectually humbling the pride, and lessening the authority and influence, of the house of Austria. Such were the first effects of this minister's refined politics !

The marquis Spinola reduces Breda, on an order conceived in half a line.

THE court of Madrid had reason to be well satisfied with the promotion of cardinal Barberini to the papal throne, under the title of Urban VIII. ; but though he espoused their interests heartily, and was allowed to have managed them with great dexterity, they proved nevertheless ineffectual. The French ministry, for various reasons, but more especially on the score of giving some assistance to the Hugonots, had conceived a very high dislike for the conduct of Spain, which they discovered by pressing the pope, who held the Valteline in a kind of sequestration, to render the forts, according to the treaty of Madrid ; and this being long protracted, the marquis de Cocuvres, with the forces of the league, made a great progress in the dispatch of it, by a shorter method than that of negotiation <sup>a</sup>. The pope likewise interfered, to prevent the king of England, Charles the first, from marrying the French princess Henrietta Maria ; and in this he likewise failed, tho' his nuncio at Paris went so far as to declare his master would not grant a dispensation. But Richlieu, who was rising to the head of the ministry, told him, that this would break no squares with the English ; they would conclude it without <sup>a</sup>. It was easily discerned from this, that those crowns were embarked in the same designs. In the Low Countries, the war was carried on, but at a vast expence, tho', at the time the truce was broken, the great argument for that measure was, that peace or war in those parts would not create a difference of 50,000 crowns a month. We may form some idea of the character of Philip and his minister from what happened upon the marquis Spinola's remonstrating against the orders that were sent him concerning a siege, which, for many reasons that he assigned, he judged in a great measure impracticable. The king's answer was in these words, Marques, j'umais Breda, Yo EL REY ; that is, Marquis, take Breda, I THE KING <sup>b</sup>. The Dutch this year made themselves masters of the capital of Brazil ; but Don Lewis de Andrada had, on the other side, some success against them at sea, as well as against the Moors. The archduke Charles, brother to the emperor, whom the king invited into Spain, with an intention, as was believed, to bestow upon him the government of Portugal, was taken sick soon after his arrival at Madrid, and died in three weeks; and this year also deceased the famous duke of Offuna, formerly viceroy of Naples <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> LE VASSOR, BATT NANI, Gen. d'Espagne.

<sup>a</sup> P. DANIEL.

<sup>b</sup> Hist.

1624.

THE deep policy of count Olivares had hitherto done no remarkable service to the crown of Spain, but, on the contrary, provoked all her neighbours; so that, without the ceremony of a general alliance, they concerted to attack her this year on all sides; the republic of Venice, and the duke of Savoy, in conjunction with the crown of France, were to prosecute the recovery of the Valtelline; and the two latter agreed farther to conquer the city and state of Genoa; the states were to make great efforts by land and sea; count Mansfield was to be furnished with an army sufficient to keep the emperor employed, and the English were to invade Spain by sea. These schemes were not only constructed, but executed; however, the Conde de Olivares lost no credit by that; and though this was a year in which the strength of the monarchy was put to very severe trials, it acquired fame that more than balanced some little loss. The Venetians would not concur in the expedition against Genoa; the French and Savoyards attempted it with great force, and with some degree of success at first; but the Spaniards supported their allies with men, money, and a fleet; and the duke of Feria, invading Piedmont, quickly constrained the enemy to abandon all the conquests they had made. The English fleet and army came to Cadiz, which they might have taken with great ease, if they had gone about it with vigour; but their general, the lord viscount Wimbleton, spent so much time in fortifying at the Puntal, that Don Ferdinand Girome transported in his sight a reinforcement to Cadiz, which saved the place. Notwithstanding this, they might certainly have taken the whole plate-fleet, if they had continued where they were; but several advice-boats being dispatched from the coast of Spain, with orders to sail to Corunna, one of them fell into the hands of the English, who thereupon directed their course thither, and the very next day that fleet, having missed all those boats, arrived safely in the port of Cadiz <sup>d</sup>. This appeared an event of such consequence to the king, who would have gone in person to the relief of that place, if Olivares had not prevented him, that he ordered anniversary rejoicings, on the 20th of November, to perpetuate the memory of this mark of the divine favour*. The quarrel of Buckingham with Olivares, as it brought this mischief on Spain, so the jealousy between that favourite and cardinal Richlieu disappointed the measures that had been concerted for the recovery of the Palatinate; and, to crown all, the marquis Spínola took Breda, and Don Frederic de Toledo had great success against the Dutch in Brazil. This year died the cardinal duke of Lerma at Valladolid.

The Spanish dominions suddenly attacked on all sides by the English, French, and Dutch.

1625.

<sup>c</sup> BATT NANI, EMANUEL DE FARIA Y SOUSA, La Vie du Duc d'Offune, Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. <sup>d</sup> Sir WILLIAM MONSON's Naval Tracts

Olivares gains an advantage over Richlieu in making the peace.

THE necessity of opposing so many enemies at once by sea and land, and in so many different parts of the world, had constrained his catholic majesty to raise, which had not been done in his reign, some extraordinary taxes upon the people; and this excited some discontent. The count de Olivares proposed that the king should make a tour into Catalonia; which journey had other political reasons. In the last campaign he had been in a manner compelled to abandon the Valteline; and finding the war on that side very troublesome, he resolved, if possible, to put an end to it by a peace. He acted in this matter with great address, and caused the Spanish minister at Paris to insinuate to cardinal Richlieu, that, in a general treaty, the princes and states in Italy would be able to prescribe laws to the two crowns, which it was equally unfit and dishonourable that they should receive; but that, if they treated secretly, they might adjust all things to their own interests. His propositions were listened to, and an ambassador sent into Spain, under pretence of complimenting the queen lately delivered of an infant, by whom a treaty for the restitution of the Valteline was concluded at Moncon, and ratified at Barcelona, intirely in favour of the Spaniards, and in which the French not only treated without the privity, but even sacrificed the interests, of their allies, which disoblged the Venetians extremely, and irritated the duke of Savoy to the last degree. Upon this the duke of Feria was recalled from the government of the Milanese, which was committed to Don Gonçales de Cordova, and all the proper measures were taken to repair the naval force of Spain, and to afford what succours were necessary to the emperor. Besides, to strengthen the interests of the German line, the infant Donna Maria, on whose account the war with England had happened, was married to Ferdinand, afterwards advanced to the imperial throne; which, if possible, drew the knot of their alliance still faster †.

1626.

* Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. EMANUEL DE FARRIA Y SOUSA.

FEW minds escape uncorrupted by prosperity; Olivares <sup>The war</sup> having disappointed in war the views of those who were stiled <sup>of Man-</sup> the allies of Avignon, and having succeeded since in a nego- <sup>tua re-</sup> tiation with France, while the emperor had in a manner ren- <sup>solved upon</sup> dered himself absolute in Germany, and pursued schemes <sup>by Oliva-</sup> that seemed to manifest a resolution to become quite so, <sup>res con-</sup> he thought the opportunity was to be improved, and no <sup>trary to the</sup> means rejected, that might exalt the grandeur of the crown <sup>sentiments</sup> of Spain. A little incident had in this respect too much <sup>of other</sup> weight with him. He had induced his master, soon after his accession to the throne, to assume the title of Great, and he afterwards considered himself as under an obligation to make him so. The spirit of independency had been checked in Italy by the treaty of Moncon; but the Valteline was by that treaty restored to the Grisons; so that the end of the war, which was shutting up in Italy, was defeated, which he could not bear. The fortress of Cazal in the Montferrat, erected and fortified by princes who could not maintain it, immediately presented itself to his view. It is true it belonged to the duke of Mantua, who was under the protection of Spain; but as it was foreseen that a dispute must arise about this succession, as the branch of the house of Gonzagua was settled in France, where they had the title of Nevers, was nearest in blood, and the house of Guastalla, being of the same family, pretended preference, as being Italians, he thought it very practicable, whenever the duke died, to seize all, till the emperor should settle the rights of the contending princes, and then to keep Cazal as a reward for restoring the rest. Into this project, by making it his interest, they drew the old duke of Savoy, and troubled not themselves about France, supposing that the intestine broils in that kingdom, to which they lent some assistance, would keep it in a state of distraction till their projects were brought to bear. In all this they were soothed by assurances from Cordova, governor of Milan, that all might be easily brought about, if he was well supplied with money. But Vincent <sup>1627.</sup> duke of Mantua, commiserating the state of his country, upon his death-bed sent for the young duke of Rhetel, eldest son to the duke of Nevers, in order to marry him to his niece, that he might have a title equally clear to Montferrat and Mantua; which marriage, commanded by his last words, was solemnized in his palace, while he was yet warm. The duke of Nevers endeavoured to open a peaceable entry to his just rights, by testifying the most obsequious submission to the crown of Spain; notwithstanding which, by the ascendancy that Olivares had over his master and his councils, the war of Mantua was resolved upon; from which resolution we are to date the declension, if not the ruin, of Spain <sup>a</sup>.

† FREDERIC LEONARD, tom. iv. Corps Diplomatique, tom. v. p. ii. p. 487.

Fortune
declares
against Spain almost everywhere at once.

1628.

As the Spaniards in general are politicians, the resolution of kindling a new war in Italy excited great discontent; but the count, who had procured to himself the title of duke de St. Lucar, which, by resignation, he meant to bestow upon a bastard son of his, was so persuaded that success must attend his measures, that he gave no great attention to these murmurs, which were not at all lessened by the crying down copper-money, on the hopes of a large supply of silver from the West Indies. In Italy, the war being begun, Cordova and the duke of Savoy endeavoured to divide the Montferrat between them; but the former, failing in surprising, was forced to besiege Cazal, which was obstinately defended. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy demanding assistance to shut the French out of Italy, the Spaniards were forced to weaken an army that was before scarce equal to the siege. The correspondence also held with the duke of Rohan and the protestants in France, not having been able to save Rochelle; and cardinal Richlieu, after the surrender of that place, having prevailed upon the king his master to go in person with a numerous army to the assistance of the duke of Mantua; raised the spirits of the Italians to such a degree, that Cordova was neither able to take Cazal, nor to keep the duke of Savoy in that degree of subjection which was expected by the court of Madrid. Add to all this, that the Dutch admiral, Peter Adrianson, beat a Spanish fleet in America, of which they burnt part, and brought a great booty home. On the 8th of September, Peter Heyn took the galleons in the neighbourhood of the Havannah, and acquired thereby for his masters, the West India company, eight millions of florins in silver at least, which, as it proved of very great advantage to the affairs of the republic, so, in many other respects, besides the immediate loss of such a treasure, it was highly detrimental to the concerns of Spain <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. Histoire du Ministère du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, avec des Reflexions Politiques. BATT NANI. <sup>b</sup> Hist. Gen. d'Espagne. Anecdotes du Duc Comte d'OLIVARES. Histoire d'Hollande, par M. DE LA NEUVILLE.

THE arrival of the French king with his forces on the The birth frontiers of Piedmont, and forcing the pass of Suza, forced of prince the duke of Savoy to a treaty, and obliged the governor of Don Bal- thazar Milan to raise the siege of Cazal; but the disorders of France obliging the king to return, revived the Spanish hopes, and happened gave them time to bring a body of Germans into Italy. very luc- They likewise sent the famous marquis Spinola to restore kily for the their affairs on that side, and furnished him so plentifully minister. with money, that the inhabitants of the Low Countries, still in obedience to his catholic majesty, looked upon themselves as abandoned, and actually sent an agent to Madrid, to make strong remonstrances for assistance, since otherwise it was impossible for them to defend themselves<sup>i</sup>. These disappointments gave the conde duke some disturbance, heightened the popular distaste against him, and might have had worse effects, if the queen had not been delivered, on the 27th of October, of the prince Don Balthazar, to the infinite joy both of the court and nation, and to the great benefit of the house of Austria. The conde duke, for so he was pleased to be called, as affecting a kind of singular behaviour in every thing, might have taken opportunity, from this incident, to have made some propositions of peace; but, instead of doing that, he entered into a new treaty with the duke of Rohan, promising him mighty things, if he would revive the troubles in that kingdom; but this had not the desired effect; and the German soldiers perishing in great numbers in Italy, together with the dispositions made by the Swedes to succour the protestants in Germany, who were 1629. driven to the last extremity, kindled the flame of a general war, which, by a kind of unanimity little known to politicians, all Europe ascribed to the ambition and obstinacy of Olivares<sup>k</sup>.

ALL hopes of succeeding in the project for bridling Italy Cardinal were now devolved upon the marquis Spinola, who had or- Richlieu ders to besiege and to reduce Cazal almost in the same terms penetrates with those he was commanded to take Breda, and this not- through withstanding it was one of the best fortifications in Italy, Savoy, with a numerous garrison, composed mostly of French and troops, commanded by marshal Thoiras, and well supplied changes the with provisions. It was supposed that the French, by their face of intestine distractions, would be with-held from any new ir- Italy. ruption, and that the correspondencies held in Mantua, and even in the family of the new duke, would suddenly produce great effects. There is no doubt but Spinola did all in his power to execute his commission, but was foiled notwithstanding by a most obstinate resistance. The duke de Richlieu, vested with the title of generalissimo, and followed by a gallant army, penetrated into Piedmont, and was very near seizing the duke of Savoy and his son, which, with other disgraces and disappointments, affected the mind of the duke to such a degree, that he died of discontent <sup>l</sup>.

<sup>i</sup> BATT NANI. Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. CES-PIDES. <sup>k</sup> Histoire Gen. d'Espagne. Anecdotes du Comte DUC D'OLIVARES.

1630. Mantua was indeed surprised, the duke and his family expelled, and the city and palace plundered, which only served to increase that hatred against the Spaniards in Italy, that was but too strong already; for the marquis Spinola dying of resentment of the reproofs he received from Spain, and Ferdinand taking upon him to make a peace at Ratisbon with the French, Cazal was saved out of their hands, and the outlines of a peace drawn, which did no honour to the councils at Madrid <sup>m</sup>. The infanta Donna Maria, queen of Hungary, was this year sent into Germany; but the promises made by Philip IV. to his subjects in the Low Countries, that he would come to redress all their grievances in person, proved a mere delusion, and excited that distrust, which afterwards was heightened into an absolute contempt of the declarations that came from Spain <sup>n</sup>.

The treaty of Querasque, and great respect paid to the cardinal both at home and abroad.

IN order to prevent the restoration of peace, or at least a tranquillity, in Italy, Olivares sent Feria again into Milan, depending on the temper and abilities of the man, who was naturally an enemy to quiet. He laboured to seduce the duke of Mantua from his allies by magnificent promises, to bring Victor duke of Savoy into a closer dependance upon Spain than ever his father had been, to create jealousy in the Venetians, and new commotions in the Valteline; but without effect. The treaty of Querasque settled the peace of Italy for the present, and not only procured the best part of his dominions, with the emperor's investiture for the duke of Mantua, but, contrary to the expectations, as well as to the interest of the Spaniards, the strong fortrefs of Pignerol, by purchase from the duke of Savoy, in the hands of the French, and an army of Grisons and Switzers under the command of the duke of Rohan, now reconciled to France, for the defence of the Valteline; so that all the schemes of Olivares, and all

<sup>l</sup> LE VASSOR, BATT NANI. Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par M. LE CLERC.

<sup>m</sup> BATT NANI, LE VASSOR. Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.

<sup>n</sup> LE

CLERC.

the intrigues of Feria, were totally defeated *. In Germany, the power of the emperor, on which Spain had so much depended, was in a great measure broken, and new complaints and demands brought from all quarters to Madrid. To satisfy, as far as possible, the desires of the people, the infant Don Carlos was sent viceroy to Portugal, the cardinal infant appointed to the government of the Low Countries, and the marquis de Santa Croce sent thither to command the forces †. At sea Don Antonio de Oequendo, with a strong fleet, equipped with great difficulty, and on board which multitudes had perished by a contagious sickness before it sailed, proceeded to the coast of Brazil, where attacking a Dutch squadron, commanded by admiral Pater, of sixteen sail, of which ten fled without fighting, because they had the good luck to sink one ship, and to blow up another, which carried the flag with the admiral on board, medals were struck in honour of the victory, with the king's head on one side, and Sampson rending the lion on the reverse ‡. But this success was quickly qualified by the loss of no less than sixty vessels in the Low Countries, and fourteen others burnt and destroyed, with the loss of many thousand men, and a prodigious quantity of military and naval stores §. This year, though they were very little able to bear the expence, the Spaniards received the queen mother of France, and her son the duke of Orleans, into their protection, fully persuaded that this would contribute to the ruin of cardinal Richlieu, whom his master thereupon created duke and peer of France; and the senate of Venice, by an unanimous vote, received him into the number of their nobility, to the no small mortification of Olivares, who considered him very justly as his implacable enemy ¶.

1631.

KING Philip concluded this year a treaty with the emperor, to enable him to defend himself the better against the Swedes; and, for the security of the Italian provinces, entered into negotiations with the duke of Savoy and the Genoese. Don Gonçales de Cordeva was sent to command the auxiliaries in the Palatinate, and the infant Don Carlos declared generalissimo by sea, for the relief of Tangier, which was besieged by the Moors. Don Antonio de Oequendo had some degree of success against the Dutch in Brazil; but, on

New methods practised for reviving the old scheme of universal influence.

* Histoire Gen. d'Espagne, BATT NANI. P LE CLERC, Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. † Hist. Metallique des Pays Bas, par GERARD VAN LOON, tom. ii. p. 192. ‡ Hist. de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE. § BATT NANI, CESPIDES.

1632. the side of the Low Countries, both the states and the French were very successful<sup>t</sup>. In the mean time the infant Don Carlos, brother to the king, died at Madrid; the prince Balthazar was acknowledged heir apparent of the Spanish monarchy, and the cardinal infant began to prepare for his journey into the Low Countries, where he was to succeed the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia in the government of those provinces<sup>u</sup>. A new tax, though laid upon persons in easy circumstances, added to the general distaste which prevailed against Olivares, already so unfortunate as to have every thing that happened amiss attributed to him, and particularly the death of the infant, a prince of a restless and active spirit, whom it was given out the conde duke had removed by poison, in order to secure himself from such aspersions<sup>w</sup>.

Cardinal infant arrived at Milan, in his way to the Low Countries. THE supreme council was revived in the kingdom of Portugal, the security of which was thought to be promoted by the duke of Bragança's marriage with the daughter of the duke of Medina Sidonia at Madrid<sup>x</sup>. The infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, daughter to Philip II. died, on the first of December, at Brussels. The cardinal infant, being come to Milan, found his progress stopped in the route he intended to have taken; to open which the duke of Feria marched with an army of 12,000 men, who performed indeed what he was sent for, and relieved the city of Constance; but it was so late in the year, that the cardinal found himself obliged to continue where he was; and it may be he did this the more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of promoting the intrigues in Italy, which began to be under some apprehensions from the Swedes. At sea and in Brazil the Dutch had various advantages; and, in the Low Countries, affairs were daily falling from bad to worse; for the forces and the treasures of Spain were employed in such a degree for the service of the emperor, or rather in support of the common interests of the house of Austria in Germany, that they were not in a condition to look after their own concerns<sup>y</sup>. Into this they were at first led by a fond hope, that when the emperor should, by their assistance, have triumphed over the protestants, and all other opponents in Germany, he would concur with them in the reduction of the Low Countries to 1633.

<sup>t</sup> LE CLERC, P. DANIEL, CESPICES.
<sup>u</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. Histoire de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE.
<sup>w</sup> Histoire Generale d'Espagne.
<sup>x</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.
<sup>y</sup> LE VASSOR. Histoire de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE.
 BATT NANI.

the state they were in at the death of the emperor Charles the fifth.

AFTER endeavours had been used in vain to bring the duke The re- of Savoy back to his former connections, persuasions, with public of better success, were tried with his two brothers; insomuch Genoa de- that prince Thomas, having sent his wife and children into taches her- Spain, retired himself to Brussels, while cardinal Maurice at self from Rome declared openly for the emperor and the king of Spain. the Spa- On the other hand, the republic of Genoa, resenting highly niards in the decision, which, in his brother's name, the cardinal in- favour of fant Don Ferdinand had made in respect to the disputes be- French. tween them and the duke of Savoy, put themselves under the protection of France, and acted with a vigour and dignity becoming a free state. In the mean time, his catholic majesty's minister at the imperial court, count de Ognate, by the instructions of Olivares, first accused, before the privy-council, the famous general Wallenstein, and afterwards proposed his assassination; which being effected, gained great applause to a measure that would otherwise have been universally condemned<sup>a</sup>. The duke of Feria being dead at Munich, the marquis de Leganez took the command of the army till the arrival of the cardinal infant, who, in conjunction with the king of Hungary, his brother-in-law, engaged and defeated the Swedes, and their confederates. The marquis de Aytona, who governed the Low Countries, till the cardinal's arrival, with great spirit, had, under colour of a conspiracy, arrested some of the principal nobility, and forced others to fly; while the king Don Philip and the conde duke, having first very roughly interrogated the duke of Aremberg, who had been sent as deputy from the nobles to the court, as to the same conspiracy, because he would not accuse himself and his friends, caused him to be arrested in their presence, and sent to a close prison<sup>b</sup>. In this situation the cardinal infant took possession of the government, where, notwithstanding these bold steps, the town of Dunkirk refused to admit a garrison that he sent thither. Gaston duke of Orleans, after making several treaties with the crown of Spain, for the invasion of his native country, and the disturbance of his brother's government, which were indifferently performed on both sides, finding himself become inconsiderable in the eyes of strangers, and being sold, as he commonly was, by one

<sup>a</sup> Histoire General d'Espagne. LE CLERC.

<sup>b</sup> BATT

NANI. Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. LE VASSOR.

<sup>c</sup> CESPICES, BATT NANI. Histoire de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE.

1634.

his favourites, returned privately into France, and thereby saved the Spaniards a great expence, which had never answered their purpose<sup>c</sup>. The conde duke, however, forming new designs, assembled a great naval force, of which having given the command to the marquis of Santa Croce, the Genoese, as he accepted it without their leave, ordered his name to be struck out of the list of their nobility<sup>d</sup>.

The crown
of France
declares
war against the cardinal
infant Don Ferdinand.

ALL these enterprizes of the crowns of France and Spain against each other, as they were in reality the fruits of that animosity which reigned between Richlieu and Olivares, were carried on without a war declared. But the cardinal infant, governor of the Low Countries, having surprised Treves, and made the elector prisoner, sent him to Vienna, to answer to the emperor for having admitted a French garrison; upon which Lewis XIII. having demanded him from the cardinal infant, rejecting his excuses, declared war in form. This declaration was followed by an army, which having defeated that of the Spaniards, commanded by prince Thomas of Savoy, threatened great things, but, through the interposition of a variety of accidents, performed little<sup>e</sup>. On the side of Italy things were in greater confusion; the duke of Rohan, having received considerable reinforcements, secured the Valteline for the French, who, entering through Piedmont with an army commanded by the duke of Crequi, invaded the Milaneſe. There they were joined by the duke of Parma, and brought with them the duke of Savoy, whose inclinations, however, were thought to be on the other side; and therefore, though this irruption promised fair, yet the event was not equal to those promises. This was chiefly owing to the conduct of the Venetians, who maintained that neutrality which their interest dictated, with a firmness and dignity worthy of that prudence for which they have been always famous<sup>f</sup>. The Spanish fleet, upon which Olivares much relied, as being composed of many large ships, with seven thousand Spanish troops on board, sailed at length for the coast of Provence, under the command of the duke of Ferandina and the marquis of Santa Croce; but, in their passage, met with a storm, by which they were dissipated, and seven gallies lost, with all that were on board them. Being, after much loss of time, once again brought into order, they attacked the islands of Hieres, and reduced them, for which

1635.

<sup>c</sup> LE VASSOR, LE CLERC.
dotes du Comte Duc d'Olivarez.
NANI.

<sup>d</sup> BATT NANI. Anec-
<sup>e</sup> LE VASSOR. <sup>f</sup> BATT

the marquis of Santa Croce was rewarded with the viceroyalty of Catalonia <sup>b</sup>.

IN Italy the Italian princes had this year good reason to Spain repent their having entered so far into the jealousies of the <sup>would be</sup> two crowns, as to make their own country the seat of war; <sup>thought to</sup> for the duchies of Parma and Modena were grievously spoiled, <sup>desire</sup> as well as the Milanese ruined, by the irruption of the Spaniards into the Milanese, though, after a battle, the marquis <sup>peace, and</sup> of Leganez drove them out, and then with his cavalry <sup>y. t. arro-</sup> ravaged Piedmont, so that destruction was spread on every <sup>gantly re-</sup> side, without any great advantage to either party <sup>refuses pass-</sup> <sup>ports for a-</sup> <sup>treaty.</sup> <sup>1636:</sup> In the Low Countries, prince Thomas of Savoy, with the assistance of the emperor's generals, pushed the war with effect; and, having taken some places in Picardy, struck such terror into the inhabitants of Paris, that the cardinal once advised the king his master to retire to Orleans; but, prince Thomas being in no condition to maintain his conquests, they were; when the French had recovered their spirits, very speedily retaken <sup>i</sup>. The Spanish fleets, attempting to put into the harbours of Genoa, were refused licence, upon certain suspicions, which heightened the hatred they had conceived against that republic. The conde duke, to display his power, and to shew his influence over his master, caused his relation, the duke de Medina de la Torres, to be declared viceroy of Naples for eight months; that while he held this dignity, he might espouse the princess of Stigliano; after which, the count de Monterey resuming that government, the duke had the viceroyalty of Sicily bestowed upon him <sup>k</sup>. In the winter both sides seemed inclined to peace, and the city of Cologne was appointed for the conferences; but when passports were required for the plenipotentiaries of the protestants of the empire, and of the states general of the United Provinces, they were refused by the emperor and the king of Spain, the former affirming, that he looked upon those princes as his vassals, and the latter avowing, that he considered the Dutch in no better light than that of rebels <sup>l</sup>.

EXPERIENCE having taught the duke of Parma with how The Gri- little advantage princes of his rank embark in the quarrels of sons are great monarchs, finding himself blocked up in one of his <sup>prevailed</sup> capitals, and his dominions surrounded by the Spaniards, he <sup>upon to</sup> made his peace by the surrender of Sabionetta, and put an <sup>drive out</sup> hundred thousand crowns into his pocket, under pretence of <sup>the duke of</sup> Rohan,

<sup>b</sup> Anecd. du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, CESPICES. <sup>k</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>l</sup> LE VASSOR, LE CLERE.

<sup>m</sup> Anecdotes,

&c.

<sup>i</sup> CESP. & al. sup. citat.

and resume repairing his fortifications. By a proper use of soft persuasions, accompanied with a dextrous distribution of money, the Grifons were prevailed upon to expel the duke of Roban, and resume their sovereignty of the Valteline, under the protection of a perpetual league with Spain. But, to balance these successes, the French recovered the islands of Hieres, and made some progress in the Low Countries, under favour of which the prince of Orange recovered Breda in nine weeks, in reducing which the marquis Spinola had spent nine months<sup>m</sup>. The conde duke, hoping to set all right, invaded Languedoc with a numerous army, commanded by the duke of Cardona and count Corbelon, who besieged Leucat; but duke Schomberg, who was governor of that province, with a small army, and that composed chiefly of militia, forced their trenches in the night, and obliged them to abandon the siege with the loss of all their cannon<sup>n</sup>. This year died the emperor Ferdinand the second, Victor duke of Savoy, and Charles duke of Mantua<sup>o</sup>. The famous imperial general Picolomini, by the consent of his master, entered into the service of Spain, and the duke of Medina de la Torres, by the influence of his protector Olivarez, was removed from the viceroyalty of Sicily to that of Naples<sup>p</sup>.

Unexpected good fortune renders the conde duke more insolent than ever.

THE situation of things in Italy was certainly favourable to Spain, and her ministers and generals lost no opportunity of improving them. The marquis de Leganez took several places in Savoy, where the marshal de Crequi was killed, and all the endeavours of the cardinal de la Valette, to restore the affairs of that country, baffled; while, on the other hand, the princess dowager of Mantua was persuaded to change sides, and to commit the protection of herself, her son, and her dominions, to the emperor and the crown of Spain<sup>q</sup>. In Germany the affairs of the house of Austria went prosperously; in the Low Countries they were unusually successful, the cardinal infant Don Ferdinand routing the young count William of Nassau with great loss, and making a capture of seventy barks laden with naval and military stores; to revenge which, his father the prince of Orange having besieged Gueldres, the cardinal forced him in his intrenchments, and gained a complete victory<sup>r</sup>. The prince of Conde, with the duke de la Valette, having laid siege to Fontarabia, an army was speedily assembled for its relief, un-

<sup>m</sup> Histoire de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE, LE VASSON, CESPICES. <sup>n</sup> Histoire de Languedoc. <sup>o</sup> BATT

NANI, LE CLERC.

<sup>p</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc D'OLIVARES.

<sup>q</sup> BATT NANI, &c.

<sup>r</sup> Auc. sup citat.

der the command of the amirante of Castile, who, with great spirit and bravery, attacked the French in their lines, beat, and forced them to raise the siege with considerable loss, and with equal shame and confusion *. There happened also a fight at sea, in which both sides claimed the victory, though neither with any great reason. But, what was esteemed of more consequence, there happened this year an insurrection in Portugal, in which some proclaimed the duke of Bragança king, of which that prince was so far from making any advantage, that he withdrew himself far enough out of their reach, as if he had been afraid of having the crown forced upon him †. Such an unusual turn of good fortune could not but be extremely welcome to the Spanish nation; and it would have been much more so, if the king had not persuaded himself that it was so intirely due to the councils of the conde duke, as to heap upon him all the rewards which the generality of his subjects thought due to other men's endeavours. In accepting these, the minister himself was much to blame, as well as in treating with the contempt he did not only the far greater part of the grandees, but also the people of certain provinces, which were once kingdoms, whose privileges he considered as fetters on the royal authority. He made no difficulty of avowing, that the great object of his wishes was to emancipate the crown from these chains, from a persuasion, that, till the king was absolute at home, he could not dictate as the conde duke desired he should to the other powers of Europe ‡; a notion he avowed, though he could not effect; and which Richlieu concealed, when he had actually atchieved it. 1638.

THE two princes of Savoy, supported by the emperor's authority, and the assistance of the Spaniards, pushed things very far in Piedmont, under colour of their having a title to the regency of their nephew; and at length prince Thomas, who was a gallant man, and a great general, surprised the city of Turin, the duchess dowager escaping half-naked into the citadel. But the prince becoming jealous of the marquis of Leganez, and fearing he would put a Spanish garrison into the place, did not press that fortress so much as he might have done, and at length prevailed upon him to consent to a truce for some months, which gave great advantage to the French; while, on the other hand, Olivares, who ne-

He persists in his resolution of having Cazal, and sends orders accordingly to M. de Leganez.

* Anecdotes du Comte Duc D'OLIVARES.

† Supp'o-

ment to Faria y Sousa's History of Portugal, by Captain JOHN STEVENS.

‡ La Storia del Conte D'OLIV. Anecdotes,

&c.

ver departed from a point he had proposed, sharply reprov'd the marquis for not reducing Cazal; telling him, that he regarded nothing as done in Italy while that was left undone <sup>w</sup>. At length the count de Harcourt, advancing with a very small force into Piedmont, renewed the war with advantage. In the Low Countries, Picolesmini forced the lines of Thionville, and obliged the French to decamp. An armada from Spain, commanded by Osequendo, consisting of upwards of threecore sail, passed through the English chanel, towards the coast of Flanders; but were attacked in their passage by the Dutch admiral Van Tromp, notwithstanding their having all the protection they could expect from the English. This fleet had a very large sum of money on board, which, with the largest ships, arrived safe in Dunkirk, but many others being taken, sunk, and destroyed, the Dutch with good reason celebrated this as a great victory <sup>x</sup>. . . The duke of Modena being now in Spain, his catholic majesty bestowed upon him the order of the Golden Fleece, and gave him the title of Highness, with which he was extremely pleased. The marquis of Leganez was likewise raised to the much envied honour of grandee of Spain, as well in regard of his services, as because he was descended from the then favoured house of Guzman, and his posterity in our times inherited the duchy of St. Lucar <sup>y</sup>.

That enterprize unaccountably defeated, and the Spanish army beaten.

THE war in Italy, which had so long occupied the attention of the conde duke, was at length, in his opinion, on the point of terminating to the advantage of Spain by the reduction of Cazal, in which the French had but a thin garrison; and the Spaniards, having concluded a treaty with the dowager princess of Mantua, derived from thence some intelligence in the place, which had no succours to expect, as the French had no troops in the field. The governor, M. de la Tour, an old and experienced officer, prepared to make the best defence possible; and the method he took suggested hopes to the Spaniards, that he would scarce make any defence at all. His forces being weak, he made no sallies; and the Spaniards being left at liberty to fortify their camp without disturbance, did it much at their leisure, and with a view chiefly of cutting off all provisions from the place, but without attending much to their line of circum-

<sup>w</sup> BATT NANI, Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.
<sup>x</sup> Histoire de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE, Histoire Metallique des Pays Bas, par GERARD VAN LOON, tom. ii. p. 244, 245.
<sup>y</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES CESPIDES.

1640.

Wallation, persuaded on that side they had nothing to fear. The count de Harcourt, however, who commanded in Savoy, having exact intelligence of the situation things were in, collected all the forces he could, though their number was but small. With these he advanced towards Cazal, brought the first news of his own march, and attacked the Spaniards so vigorously, that, after the loss of three thousand men upon the spot, they quitted their lines, and for the most part disbanded, leaving their tents, baggage, and artillery, to the conquerors<sup>2</sup>. At his return into Savoy, the count, with an army smaller than would be now thought requisite for its garrison, invested Turin, which was bravely defended by prince Thomas: yet, notwithstanding several attempts made by the marquis of Leganez for its relief, but without success, it was surrendered towards the close of September<sup>3</sup>. Soon after this, prince Thomas reconciled himself to the French by a treaty, negotiated with great secrecy by the famous cardinal Mazarine. In the Palatinate the Spanish troops had some advantages; but in the Low Countries they lost the important city of Arras, notwithstanding the cardinal infant made a generous attempt to relieve it, which very much raised his reputation, though it was not in his power to save the place. On the side of Spain itself, the French had taken Salses, and some other places in Roussillon, which the Spaniards easily recovered; but the consequences of this were fatal to them, beyond all the losses they had sustained in the course of the war<sup>4</sup>; a thing that must appear strange to the reader, and which therefore we shall immediately explain.

We have before observed, that the conde duke was by Olivares no means pleased with the distinct privileges of certain provinces, and meditated the reduction of all Spain, under what he stiled one form of government, which was generally supposed to differ little, if at all, from a despotic monarchy. It is no wonder, therefore, that, to a minister with these notions, the Catalans should be in a particular manner odious, since they were the freest of all his catholic majesty's subjects. He had, the very last time the king was at Barcelona, prevailed upon him to leave that city while the states were sitting in it, abruptly, and induced him from that time to treat whatever applications they made by their deputies very roughly<sup>5</sup>. The Catalans indeed, instead of stooping to him, had behaved on their side very cavalierly,

design of depriving the Catalans of their privileges.

<sup>2</sup> LE VASSOR, CESPIDES.<sup>3</sup> BATT NANI.<sup>4</sup> LE

CLERC, &amp; al.

<sup>5</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.

VARLÈS.

refusing not only to make any application, in order to recover his favour, but refusing to have any correspondence with him whatever, and, in all their remonstrances, told the king plainly, that they looked upon Olivares as their declared enemy, and for that reason unworthy of his majesty's confidence. This without doubt heightened his resentments, of which they would have felt the effects, if they had not been protected by the situation of their country, covered on every side by almost inaccessible mountains, except where it is bounded by the sea; and, besides, so contiguous to France, that the inhabitants might be easily supported from thence, if they should ever be driven to demand the protection of that crown. But the expedition into Roussillon had removed these difficulties, and had carried an army into that country, to which the Catalans contributed a corps of their own troops, who quitted it before the end of the campaign, being persuaded that they were sacrificed by the king's forces, whose duty it was to have supported them<sup>d</sup>.

The Catalans revolt universally, and murder their viceroy.

AFTER the reduction of Salses, the army had orders to take their winter quarters in Catalonia, in direct breach of their privileges; and, as if this had not been enough, they were allowed to live there with such licence as would scarce have been excusable in an enemy's country. Murders were common, rapes more frequent, robberies practised daily with impunity, complaints made to their officers produced no relief, and remonstrances at court were received with a coldness that differed little from contempt<sup>e</sup>. This produced a universal discontent, which was blown into a flame by the inconsiderate conduct of the count de St. Coloma, who was then viceroy. He, under pretence of wanting money to pay the troops, seized a large sum belonging to the city of Barcelona, and, upon one of their magistrates going to expostulate with him, sent him to prison, from whence the people in general, taking arms, quickly delivered him. The viceroy, whose courage was just as great as his prudence, fled immediately to the arsenal, where not thinking himself safe, notwithstanding all the assurances the magistrates could give, he ordered a gally, which he had long kept upon the coast, in case of falling into such an extremity, to anchor as near the arsenal as possible; yet, though the passage was not very long, he fell into the hands of the populace, who, in the first transport of their fury, murdered him, and then,

<sup>d</sup> Histoire du Ministère du Comte Duc d'Olivares, CESPID.
<sup>e</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

despairing

despairing of pardon, made themselves masters of Barcelona. In a few days the revolt became general, the Spanish soldiers were every-where driven out, and glad to escape with their lives. Some attempts were made by the interposition of the old duchess of Caldona and the pope's nuncio to pacify the people, with promise of a general pardon; but these had no effect, an army was quickly raised of thirty thousand men, under the command of the marquis de los Velez himself, a Catalan, but hated by his countrymen, as a creature of the minister's<sup>f</sup>.

At the time he put himself at the head of this army, the marquis received a private order from Olivares to proceed with the utmost severity, as well as with the greatest expedition. He did not fail in either; which, however, had no other effect, than to make those desperate who were already exasperated. He advanced directly to Barcelona, taking with little resistance several places in his way, which he destroyed without mercy<sup>g</sup>. The Catalans were in the utmost consternation, and, if mercy had been then promised, would certainly have submitted; for though they had offered themselves to France, yet, as it required some time to settle the terms, they had received very slender supplies under the command of Mr. St. Paul from thence. Yet even these encouraged them to defend themselves with spirit, since they had to do with men from whom victory alone could procure them safety. The marquis made three attacks on the fort Montjuic, which commands the city, and was, though with great difficulty, repulsed, chiefly by the courage and conduct of the French officers; for the Catalans, having been purposely kept from the use of arms for many years, discovered but little of their antient bravery, which, however, interest and discipline quickly restored, and, before the end of the winter, the enemy were obliged to abandon a great part of their conquests<sup>h</sup>. This was very mortifying to Olivares, who, with some difficulty, had prevented the king from marching against them in person, from an apprehension that the king might have received informations no ways suitable to his interests. The sense he had of this, and of the immediate necessity of subduing this people before they entered into a settled connection with foreigners, added to the natural rigour and violence of his own temper, put him upon those measures which produced still greater calamities; and, while he was

<sup>f</sup> CESPIDES, BATT NANI, LE VASSOR.
du Comte Duc D'OLIVARES.
tat.

<sup>g</sup> Anecdotes
<sup>h</sup> Vide auct. supra citat.

intent upon extinguishing one flame, lighted another that never could be brought under. Great part of the army then in Catalonia was composed of Portuguese: the conde duke resolved to draw his reinforcements from the same country, for, hating the Portuguese as much as he did the Catalans, he weakly imagined that he might make them reciprocally the instruments of his resentment, or at least was desirous of bringing the principal nobility of Portugal to serve in an army at a distance from their own country, that, at the same time that they were incapable of doing hurt themselves, they might serve as hostages for the obedience of those they left at home. He was misled in this by that constant submission which he saw paid to his orders in the court, and he vainly fancied that he was to be implicitly obeyed where-ever his orders reached: himself and his master felt the contrary.

Revolution of Portugal, thro' the obstinate rigour of the conde duke's conduct.

WE are, in the succeeding section, to explain the motives and management of the revolution in Portugal, and therefore we shall content ourselves with observing here some other instances of the pains taken by the conde duke to facilitate the ascent of the duke of Braganza to the throne, while he was so infatuated to believe that he should allure that prince to Madrid, where, if he had once arrived, he had never been permitted to return to Portugal. In order to take away all grounds of suspicion, Olivares had declared the duke general of the forces in Portugal, and had weakened most of the Spanish garrisons, that he might seem to repose all upon his loyalty; and yet, if he had visited any one fort upon the Tagus, he had been surprised, and sent prisoner into Spain. At the same time that he dissembled with the duke, he drove the rest of the nobility into despair, requiring of them what it was not in their power to perform, and threatening the severest chastisements if they refused to obey. The instruments upon which he relied were two natives of Portugal, mean in their birth, infamous in their characters, insolent to the last degree in their behaviour; one of these residing at Madrid with the title of secretary of state; and the other, who had the minister's secret, resided as secretary to the vice-queen at Lisbon. The person honoured with this empty title was the infanta Donna Margaret of Savoy, duchess dowager of Mantua, and grand-daughter to Philip the second; a princess very capable of governing that kingdom, but whom, notwithstanding her birth, Olivares treated with contempt, and suffered to be still worse treated by the engine of his intrigues, her secretary. The nobility in general, seeing themselves condemned to exile and slavery, believed it impossible to escape the punishment of rebels, but by raising a rebellion: the weakness of the Spanish government persuaded them this was easy; the behaviour of the Catalans encouraged them; they wanted only a proper head, and the duke of Braganza, who had a fair title to the crown, was continually in their sight. They made him an offer of it, and, by the advice of his duchess, he accepted it. The design was managed with prudence, vigour, and secrecy, yet the vice-queen had some intelligence, or rather some suspicion, of it; she gave advice to the conde duke, but her advices were neglected and despised. The confederates gained some lights in their turn, and this obliged them to act sooner than they intended, but with so much unanimity and courage, that Lisbon was surprised, Don Juan the fourth proclaimed, the vice queen made prisoner, the fleet seized, the fortresses reduced, the Spaniards driven out, and a new government settled, in less than a month's time <sup>k</sup> (B).

<sup>1</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, CESPIDES.

IN

<sup>k</sup> STEVENS'S Supplement to Sousa's History of Portugal.

(B) The grand source of that long train of grievances, which in the end produced the revolution of Portugal, was the disposition of the minister, who had conceived an aversion to the people, because they set up their privileges against his absolute orders, and, after having been courted by Philip the second, and flattered by Philip the third, did not consider it as an honour to be trampled on by the favourite of Philip the fourth (6). He thought it very practicable to break the spirits of these people, in order to fit them for that change he meditated, which was converting their kingdom into a province of Castile. He was encouraged in these notions by two of the most infamous men of that nation, into whose hands, and for this reason, he put the affairs of their country. The first was Diego Suarez, who resided at Madrid, and acted as secretary for the affairs of Portugal; he was a cunning, subtle, and artful fellow; who had amassed an immense fortune by his great interest with the minister, and the ill use he made of it. He was rapacious, vindictive, and insolent, in a supreme degree. The other was his brother and son-in-law, his name was Michael Vasconcellos, and the place he held that of secretary to the vice-queen at Lisbon, but in reality he had the sole direction of all things, corresponding with and receiving directions imme-

(6) Stevens's Supplement to Emanuel de Faria y Sousa's History, Historia de Don Phelipe IV. Rey de las Espanas, por Don Gonçalo de Cespedes y Meneses.

diately

The death
of the cardinal infant, governors of
the Low Countries
and archbishop of Toledo.

1641.

In Italy the affairs of Spain went backwards; the count de Harcourt and Monsieur de Turenne performed great things in Savoy, though they had but a small army. The marquis de Leganez did what he could, but that was little, being stinted in supplies, and suspected by his friends. The prince of Monaco, whom the Spaniards had long treated as their slave, revolted, and put the place into the hands of the French<sup>1</sup>. In Spain itself, where they had the war on both sides, the minister determined to push Catalonia, where the marquis de los Velez reduced Tarragona, and did all that could be expected towards taking Barcelona; but the terror, distress, and confusion, of the Catalans, having obliged them to submit to cardinal Richlieu's terms, the French sent marshal de la Mothe Houdancourt, with more puissant supplies, and made also some diversions in their favour, so that by the end of the year the marquis was less able to complete the reduction of the province than he had been at the beginning. The projects of Olivares were always out of the common road. When he gave the king notice of the revolution in Portugal, he wished him joy of the duke of Braganza's large forfeiture, as if it had been as easy to reduce Portugal as it had been to raise a rebellion there<sup>2</sup>. Yet during this year he attempted little or nothing, only he appointed the duke of Medina Sidonia to command on the frontiers, whose sister

<sup>1</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>2</sup> STEVENS'S Supplement, Anecdotes du Comte Duc D'OLIVARES.

diately from the minister (7). He was very dextrous and adroit in the affairs committed to his management; he interfered in the disputes between the nobility, and, by browbeating some, and countenancing others, increased and inflamed them. He understood the dangerous science of inventing taxes, and had an army of mercenary creatures at his devotion to levy them: he had spies in all families of any distinction, and was never at a loss for expedients to answer any of the conde duke's purposes (8). In short, he daily inflicted wounds on the bosom of his country, and made a merit to his patron of that dejection and poverty which were the result of his own arts. These men had served him so long and so effectually, that the conde duke thought the Portuguese so exhausted, that he had nothing to apprehend from them; but experience taught him, that men dare to hope all things, when they have nothing to fear (9).

(7) Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'Olivares, p. 301.
lution de Portugal.
Souza's History.

(8) Vertot, Revolution de Portugal.
(9) Stevens's Supplement to Emanuel de Portugal

the new king had married, which occasioned many speculations; but in truth he depended on a conspiracy which was very near succeeding. This being discovered, he threw some imputations upon the duke, and sent for him to court, where he justified himself so well as to escape punishment, though some have thought, that if the people of Andalusia had been as well disposed as himself, he would have attempted, with the assistance of the French fleet in the Mediterranean, to have established an independent sovereignty in that fair and fruitful province. But the most fatal event was in the Low Countries, where the cardinal infant recovered Aire, a place of great importance, with many circumstances of honour. Yet he did not live to take possession of the town; for, falling ill of a fever in the camp, and his distemper being mistaken by his physicians, upon his removal to Brussels it appeared to be the small-pox, of which he died on the 9th of November, in the thirty-second year of his age<sup>a</sup>. His character appears, from a medal struck in Holland, in the clearest light, the inscriptions of which were to this purpose; that, the Spanish sun being set, they promised to themselves a fair day<sup>o</sup>. He was succeeded for the present by Don Francisco de Melo; and though, in hopes of some disturbance, Lewis the thirteenth appeared in person on the frontiers, yet nothing of that kind happened, and Don Francisco took possession of Aire on the seventh of December following<sup>p</sup>.

This series of ill fortune, which ought to have opened Amazing the eyes of the catholic king and his ministers, seemed to instances of infatuate both. The great secret by which Olivares had go- infatua- verned his master was being the companion, or at least the tion both confident, of his pleasures; and, while he affected to deceive in the the world with a specious appearance of religion and piety, king and he was not only immersed in vice himself, but encouraged in the and promoted it in his prince, to the scandal of his subjects, conde duke. and the prejudice of his affairs. At this time, of all others 1642. the most improper, Olivares produced a bastard of his, hitherto called Julian, of whom he had taken so little care, that, not able to subsist in Spain, he had passed over to the Indies, where, in very mean stations, he had scarce got bread, on whom he now bestowed the name of Don Henrique de Guzman, and, bringing him with great pomp and splendor to court, either flattered or forced the constable of Castile to give him his daughter, in consideration of which

<sup>a</sup> LE CLERC, CESPIDES.

Pays Bas, par GERARD VAN LOON, tom. ii. p. 255.

VASSOR, BATT NANI.

<sup>o</sup> Histoire Metallique des<sup>p</sup> LE

he was to devolve upon him his duchy of St. Lúcar <sup>9</sup>. In the beginning of his administration, by some accident or other, he presented to the king a memorial, in relation to an affair, upon which his majesty had already received one from Don Balthasar de Zuniga; upon comparing them, they contradicted each other flatly. The king ordered a person of great quality to inquire thoroughly into this business, in consequence of which Don Balthasar's memorial appeared to be the truth, and that of Olivares the reverse of it. The king, upon this, was very angry; but the count regained his favour, by procuring for him the fair actress Calderona. By this woman he had a son, of whom no great notice was taken; but now, to obscure the folly of the conde duke, this youth, scarce in the 14th year of his age, was produced, with the title of Don Juan of Austria, and declared generalissimo of the army against Portugal, while the heir apparent to the crown, Don Balthasar, was left under the tuition, or rather in the custody, of the countess of Olivares, at which the queen was chagrined, the people enraged, and the world in general astonished <sup>r</sup>.

That minister's schemes
everywhere, and in every kind, broken and
defeated.

IN Italy the fear of Spain was wore away, and the profound respect that had been paid to her began to follow it. Things would even have proceeded farther, if the growing power of France had not engaged the prudent politician, for which that country was always famous, to prop that structure which they might easily have pulled down. King Philip was resolved to go in person against the Catalans; the conde duke dissuaded, but was not able to prevent it; however, the king went no farther than Satagossa, and that with such numerous attendance, and with so great an expence, that, instead of hastening, it retarded the campaign <sup>s</sup>. The conde duke attended, and provided all possible amusements and diversions in the course of the journey, which, however, proved none of the most pleasant. Cardinal Richlieu had brought the king his master from Paris with a numerous army under the command of the marshal la Meilleraie; but whether with an intent to pass into Italy, or the frontiers of Spain, was not known. At length the storm burst upon Roussillon, where the army attacked Cóiva, in order to open a passage to the siege of Perpignan. Olivares understanding that it was ill provided, ordered it to be relieved by a body of three thousand horse. Persons, who were well

<sup>9</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES.

<sup>r</sup> CESPIDES.

BATT NANI.

<sup>s</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES,

CESPIDES.

versed in military affairs, assured him the thing was impracticable; he heard them, and repeated his orders. The forwardness always shewn to fulfil the desires of a powerful favourite, engaged many officers, and some persons of distinction, to offer themselves as volunteers, though they knew the expedition was exceedingly hazardous, as they were to march amongst high mountains, and to traverse a part of Catalonia, then in open rebellion. They did, however, all that was to be done; they attempted it, and, being entangled in an impassable country, from which the peasants had conveyed every thing that was eatable, with enemies on every side, without having the power either of fighting or flying, they were obliged to deliver up their arms, their colours, and horses, and to render themselves prisoners of war, to prevent being starved. Coliva taken, Perpignan was invested, in which the governor, the marquis Flores d'Avila, made a long, a gallant, and prudent defence; but it was to little purpose, for though the minister spared not either for treasure or trouble, he was not able to assemble an army till the place was lost. These strokes of ill fortune were doubled by his preventing any advantage from being made of great and unexpected success. The French, who had not then so great armies as they have had since, in order to strengthen that which went with the king had left only two small corps of troops on the frontiers, towards the Low Countries, the one commanded by the count de Harcourt, and the other by the count de Guiche. Don Francisco de Mello, a very prudent man, and a good officer, had assembled an army of twenty-five thousand men, with which he recovered several places; and then, dividing it, pretended to make two inroads into France, but, suddenly uniting his troops again, fell upon the count de Guiche so unexpectedly, that, having routed him totally, he opened a clear passage to Paris; but, receiving positive orders from Olivarez not to hazard his army in any undertaking of danger or difficulty, the opportunity was lost. The reason of this order was, that Olivares had concluded a new treaty with Gaston duke of Orleans, and was in the secret of a deep contrivance against the cardinal's life. Those who were embarked in it were the king's favourites, who carried their point so far, that the cardinal was disgraced, and was forced in a manner to fly, though in a dying condition. In this critical conjuncture came

† BATT NANI.

‡ Histoire du Ministère du Comte Duc d'Olivares, avec des Réflexions politiques, CESPICES.

¶ Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES. * LE VASSOR.

the news of Guiche's defeat, and the danger of Paris; which so alarmed the king, that he followed the cardinal, who in the mean time had discovered his brother's treaty of Spain. Upon this, de Thou and Cinquemars were arrested, the duke of Orleans forbidden the king's presence, and the cardinal taken into higher favour than ever<sup>1</sup>. These advices, following that of the loss of Perpignan, disconcerted Olivares so much, that, embracing the king's knees, and falling at his feet, he besought his leave to retire, to give him some command where he might have an opportunity of losing his life, with other incoherent speeches, which scarce, with the strongest assurances, and fairest promises, Philip could pacify, who, when he learned the reason of these transports, joined in deploring their common misfortune, and the lamentable disaster of being undone by their own arts; for if either the money spent in the secret treaty had been employed against the Catalans, or Don Francisco de Mello had not been restrained, this campaign had ended much otherwise than it did<sup>2</sup>.

Disgraced,
by the queen, the emperor,
the gran-
dees, and people, declaring at once.

1643.

AT the king's return to Madrid, it was discerned that his affection was not so strong as formerly to Olivares, either wearied with ill fortune, alarmed with what he had seen and heard in his progress, or touched with the thinness of his court, from which almost all the grândees retired, and the silence of the people when he appeared in public. The queen, perceiving this alteration, declared her sentiments first, ascribing all the mischiefs that had happened to the refined and romantic politics of Olivares, to whom she likewise imputed some private discontents of her own. The ice being broke, the marquis de Grana presented the king with a letter from the emperor his master, who charged the conde duke with abasing the glory of the house of Austria by his ill conduct and intrigues. When the king began to stagger, the queen presented the infanta Donna Margaret of Savoy, whom she had sent for privately from the place where Olivares had banished her; and, as if this had not been enough, the king's nurse, who had felt the minister's displeasure, was likewise brought to court, who, falling at Philip's feet as he passed from one apartment to another, with tears streaming from her eyes, in her plain and artless language represented the miseries of his subjects in so pathetic a manner, that the king was very much moved. He took advantage, therefore, of a hunting-match, and, before his departure, sent a billet to the minister, by which he directed him to retire to Leches<sup>a</sup>. The conde duke obeyed, and was forced to disguise himself, to avoid the insolence of the populace, or perhaps something worse. He seemed to bear his disgrace steadily, and some have thought he might have surmounted it; for the king, being new in business, and having to do with ministers as new as himself, was quickly disgusted, and seemed to wish for his old minister again. But the conde duke, ever able and ever unfortunate, drew up an apology for himself, full of wit and spirit, and masterly reasoning, as in truth his politics look best upon paper, in which some maxims were acknowledged which should have been concealed, some things avowed that could not have been proved, and various persons treated in such a manner, that so loud and general a clamour was excited; as not only obliged the king to lay aside his former design, but induced him likewise to banish him to Toro<sup>b</sup>. The Catalans, having received marshal de la Mothe, in the quality of viceroy of France, gained some advantages; the Portuguese were successful by sea; and Don Francisco de Melo was beat at Rocroi by the duke of Enguien, then but a boy, stiled afterwards the great Conde, on the 5th day of Lewis XIV.'s reign; so that, notwithstanding the return of the *grande*s to court, and the offers received of men and money from various provinces, his catholic majesty remained still uneasy and perplexed, sensible of the great burden that lay upon his shoulders, and at a loss upon whom to deposit a load which he was every day more and more convinced was altogether insupportable<sup>c</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> P. DANIEL, Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, LE VASSOR. <sup>2</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

THE disasters of the next year did not by any means con-tribute to reconcile the king to business. In Italy, where the house of Austria had been lately predominant, they were excluded from having so much as a share in the negotiations for reconciling the duke of Parma to the pope, the treaty being concluded by the guaranty and under the mediation of France, and the military operations in Savoy went as unwisely as these negotiations<sup>d</sup>. In Germany the imperialists were every-where beaten, and lost several very considerable

Public
affairs at home and abroad grow rather worse on all sides
than better.

<sup>a</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc d'OLIVARES, La Storia del Conte Duca d'Olivares, Histoire du Ministere du Comte Duc d'Olivares, avec des Reflexions politiques.

<sup>b</sup> CESPIDES.

<sup>c</sup> QUINCY,

Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. ii. & suiv. Hist. de Conde, p. 27. STEVENS'S Supplement to Sousa's History of Portugal.

<sup>d</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>e</sup> Histoire de la vie

& du regne de Louis XIV. par M. BRUZEN DE LA MARTINIERE.

1644.

places. In the Low Countries the French became masters of Gravelin, and the Dutch of Sas van Ghent<sup>e</sup>. In Catalonia the Spanish army prospered, and, after succouring Tarragona and Lerida, was reduced. But, on the side of Portugal, the marquis of Torrecusa was routed at Badajoz by the duke of Albuquerque, with great loss; and the Spanish fleet was likewise beat in sight of *Carthagen*a by the marshal de Brezé<sup>f</sup>. Yet what afflicted the Spaniards more than all these losses, was the death of the queen, on the sixth of October, in the flower of her age, and when she was become infinitely beloved by the people. She had gained intirely the confidence of the king her husband, who, after her decease, committed the management of public affairs to Don Lewis Haro de Guzman, nephew to the conde duke de Olivares, and yet no way attached to him, and who, after his elevation, pursued quite different measures<sup>g</sup>. He is generally allowed to have had less abilities, but withal was less assuming, of a pacific temper, whose affability, if it did not render him more respected, at least made him more beloved.

The torrent of ill-fortune continues to bear down all before it.

1645.

THE war still continuing on all sides, served to increase the miseries of the nation, and the perplexity of the king and his ministers. On the side of the Milanese something might have been done against Savoy, where the French were embarrassed with a very troublesome treaty; but the marquis de Serra, who commanded for the Spaniards, wanted men, money, and allies; for the Italian princes, seeing the two crowns wasting their wealth and strength, without any prejudice to them, scarce assisted either party, or took any great pains in adjusting disputes<sup>h</sup>. However, prince Thomas of Savoy, who had now declared for France, laboured hard in procuring a force that might be able to make a figure the next year; and it may be would have done this with more vivacity, if the French had not sent an officer of note to command under him. In Germany, the house of Austria met with many disadvantages; in the Low Countries, they had the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange at once to deal with: the former took Mardyke, and some other places; the latter besieged Hulst, which was well defended; and, while he remained before it, the Spaniards recovered most of the places that had been taken by the French<sup>i</sup>. On the side of

<sup>e</sup> Hist. de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE. BATT NANI.

<sup>f</sup> STEVENS'S Supplement to Soufa's History of Portugal. LA MARTINIÈRE.

<sup>g</sup> Hist. Chronologique du dernier Siecle.

<sup>h</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>i</sup> LE CLERC. Hist. de Hollande, par Monsieur DE LA NEUVILLE, LA MARTINIÈRE.

Portugal, the marquis de Leganez commanded the Spanish army, but did nothing of importance the whole campaign. In Catalonia, the count de Harcourt came to Barcelona, and was received as viceroy from the French king; the marquis du Plessis Praslin took Roses, and, being made marshal of France, was sent to assist prince Thomas of Savoy<sup>k</sup>. The Spanish army was commanded by Don Andrea Cantelmo, who was very inactive during the summer; for it seems the Spanish ministry depended upon a conspiracy formed in Barcelona, where an insurrection was to have been favoured by the appearance of their fleet, and to have been supported by the sudden march of the army. It was discovered just at the point of execution, which cost the lives of some of the lay conspirators, and the perpetual imprisonment of the ecclesiastics, that were concerned in it<sup>l</sup>. The count de Harcourt attacked Don Andrea on the banks of the Tegro, and, having defeated him, took Balaguer. The conde duke de Olivares, worn out by his infirmities, or rather devoured by his despair, died in the place of his banishment, at a juncture when, in the opinion of many, if restored to his power, things might have gone better; which notion proceeded, it may be, from a certainty that things could not go worse<sup>m</sup>.

WHEN things were in so strange a situation, we may excuse the Spanish ministers for recurring to the old practice of attempting to facilitate by intrigues what they were not able to accomplish by force. The then pope Innocent X. was inclined to their interests: they had some partisans in Holland, and in France they touched every string. They laboured to excite divisions in the French councils; they proposed a separate peace to the United Provinces; nay, they went so far as to offer their mediation to the queen of France, professing that his catholic majesty would be content to make her the supreme judge between her brother and her son; but it was in vain; so that the war continued on every side<sup>n</sup>. As cardinal Mazarine was desirous of making a figure in Italy, prince Thomas of Savoy, and the marshal du Plessis Praslin, besieged Orbitello, and, to assist in taking it, the French fleet sailed under the command of the duke de Brezé. The place was in a bad condition; it could only be relieved from Naples; and a body of troops advanced from thence, but it was so small a body that they could do nothing. In the mean time the Spanish fleet, commanded by admiral Pimentel, ap-

Civil dissensions in France give the Spaniards leave to breathe and hope.

1546.

<sup>k</sup> STEVENS'S Supplement. MARTINIERE. <sup>l</sup> BATT NANI.
<sup>m</sup> Anecdotes du Comte Duc DE OLIVARES. MARTINIERE.
<sup>n</sup> BATT NANI. LE CLERG.

peared; the French engaged and beat them, but, towards the end of the action, the duke of Brezé had his head carried away by a cannon-ball. His vice-admiral, for some political reasons, returned as soon as possible to France<sup>o</sup>. This happened on the 14th of June; and admiral Pimentel, taking advantage of his absence, landed a body of troops, which, being joined to those of Naples, forced prince Thomas to raise the siege; upon which he fell into disgrace with the court of France: and another fleet of theirs, arriving on the coast of Elba, took several places<sup>p</sup>. In the Low Countries, the French and Dutch took several fortresses, tho' the Spanish army was commanded by prince Charles of Lorrain, Picolomini, and other great officers, who, for want of troops, were able to do little, except discovering their abilities, by obliging the enemy to pay dear for what they obtained. On the side of Portugal there happened nothing of consequence; and yet the campaign did not pass without bloodshed on both parts<sup>q</sup>. In Catalonia things took another turn; the marquis de Leganez commanded for his catholic majesty, with an army, not numerous enough to act offensively. The viceroy monsieur de Harcourt besieged Lerida, which had no great garrison, and was not in a very good condition. The governor had the address to make the besiegers believe that his state was worse than it really was; and, under persuasion that famine would oblige him to surrender, they did not press the siege so vigorously as they might have done. The marquis de Leganez, who knew exactly how things stood, caused a great convoy to be provided, and, when it was near ready, advanced towards Lerida, as if he meant to relieve the place. After lying some time within sight of the French army, he decamped, as if he had abandoned his design, and having retired to the same distance from Lerida that the place was at on the other side, through which the convoy was to proceed, he marched directly back again, and appearing very unexpectedly on one side of the French camp, in order of battle, while the count de Harcourt prepared with some hurry to receive him, the convoy, with a strong reinforcement, entered safely on the other side; upon which he was obliged to raise the siege, which chagrined him so much that he quitted the command. This small piece of good fortune was far from consoling the court of Madrid for the loss of the prince Don Balthazar, who died on the ninth of October, to the great grief of the Spanish nation, who flattered themselves with a change of fortune under his reign <sup>r</sup>.

<sup>o</sup> MARTINIÈRE. <sup>p</sup> Idem. <sup>q</sup> STEVENS's Supplement to Sousa's History of Portugal.

AFFAIRS in Italy had a melancholy aspect at the beginning <sup>Sign a</sup> of the year, when the duke of Modena, with the title of ge- <sup>peace with</sup> neralissimo, and having two good French officers under him, <sup>the States-</sup> invested Cremona; but, misunderstandings arising amongst <sup>general,</sup> these chiefs, the enterprize failed, and the duke returned in- <sup>and gain</sup> to his own dominions <sup>some ad-</sup>. The unexpected and unexampled <sup>vantages</sup> revolution at Naples, stiled commonly the rebellion of Mas- <sup>in Catalo-</sup> saniello, threw all things once more into confusion; more <sup>nia.</sup> especially after the duke of Guise had entered that city, and taught sedition to wear the appearance of a regular government <sup>s</sup>. Don Juan of Austria, declared general by sea, came and blocked up the place with a fleet; notwithstanding which the inhabitants remained in arms, and, if France had succoured the duke of Guise, Naples might have been gained for her, or at least had been lost to Spain. In the Low Countries, the Dutch statesmen were prevailed upon, in the beginning of the year, to sign a provisional treaty with Spain, till that of peace could be intirely adjusted. The archduke Leopold William was declared governor of the Spanish Low Countries, with the same extensive powers that the archduke Albert and the cardinal infant had enjoyed. He brought with him a reinforcement of troops from the emperor, conducted the war with prudence and valour, and with some degree also of success, which was principally owing to his being earlier in the field than the French; a circumstance not very common with the Spanish armies <sup>u</sup>. The campaign, on the side of Portugal afforded no event worth mentioning, only a base design that some of the Spanish ministers entered into, for assassinating the king Don Juan, was discovered <sup>v</sup> and punished <sup>w</sup>. In Catalonia the marquis of Aitona com- <sup>1647.</sup> manded for his catholic majesty, and the young prince of Conde, already famous for many victories, succeeded the count de Harcourt as viceroy of Catalonia. He resolved to distinguish his entrance on the administration, by reducing Lerida, in which his predecessor had failed. He found the lines of the count de Harcourt so little injured, that they were repaired, and the place invested in two days; after which, in a fit of gaiety, he caused the trenches to be opened with a concert of violins. The old governor Don Antonio Brito, a Portuguese by birth, and well supplied with every thing, <sup>r</sup> Hist. Chronologique du dernier Siecle.

<sup>s</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>t</sup> GABRIEL TONTALI il Massaniello. MARTINIERE.

<sup>u</sup> LE

CLERC.

<sup>w</sup> STEVENS's Supplement.

had a garrison of 3000 men. His conduct was the very reverse of what it had been before, harrassing the enemy with continual sallies, and disputing with obstinacy every inch of ground. The French ascribed this to his being sensible that they made their attack in the right place, and that he would be obliged to surrender as soon as they were masters of the outworks. In the midst of these expectations, the engineers found their trenches stopped by a rock: it was impossible to go on, it was too late to begin again, the army was diminished, the heats were coming on, the Spanish general advanced to its relief, and the prince of Conde was obliged to raise the siege *. The rest of the campaign was spent in marches and countermarches; so that there happened nothing of importance, his catholic majesty having expressly commanded the marquis de Aitona not to risk any thing against the prince, of whose good fortune he is said to have been afraid. The French fleet, however, had some success at sea, the Spaniards having the best part of their naval force on the coasts of the kingdom of Naples †.

A conspiracy discovered, intended to bring about a marriage between the infant-a and the prince of Brazil.

AFTER having wasted for so many years both troops and treasure, the two crowns found themselves almost equally exhausted in Italy. The marquis de Carracena, who commanded for the catholic king in the Milanese, had, however, the superiority this spring, and seemed disposed to make a right use of it, by attacking the French troops under the marquis de Navailles, who were but very unhappily posted. As he executed this resolution slowly, the marshal du Plessis Praslin had time to join him, and the duke of Medena then arriving in their camp, they resolved to attack the marquis, though he was strongly intrenched under the cannon of Cremona, in which they were successful; but forming the siege of that city in the midst of summer, it held out to October, and their army being by that time ruined, they were forced to raise it ‡. In Naples, the duke of Guise was taken prisoner, and an end put to that rebellion by Don Juan of Austria §. In the Low Countries, the archduke had the satisfaction of seeing the peace signed between Spain and the United Provinces, on the 30th day of January, in spite of the opposition of the young prince of Orange, and against the will of the French ¶, who, having withdrawn the prince of Conde from Catalonia, sent him to open the campaign on * MARTINIERE Hist. Gen. d'Espagne.

† CESPIDES.

‡ BATT NANI.

§ MARTINIERE.

¶ Corps Univer-

sel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vi. p. i. p. 429. LE CLERC.

this side, in which, at the beginning, he had no great success, the archduke taking Courtray by a short siege, and Lens by assault; immediately after which the prince attacked and defeated the Spanish army, with the loss of 8000 men, notwithstanding the most obstinate resistance, and the archduke's giving all possible testimonies of courage and conduct. There happened also in the course of this campaign some little misfortunes on this side, which the archduke studied to repair. In Spain the people were afflicted both with a plague and famine. There was but little done on the side of Portugal, and that not to the advantage of king Philip. Marshal Schomberg, who replaced the prince of Conde in Catalonia, attacked Tortosa, and took it by storm. It was very indifferently provided, and worse fortified; but it was very gallantly defended, the bishop and the best part of his clergy being killed in the breach. The Spanish army being reinforced soon after, hindered any greater progress being made. The king, being pressed by his subjects to a second marriage, resolved to espouse the archduchess Mary Anne, daughter to the emperor by the infanta Donna Maria, and consequently his own niece. Before we close the history of this year, it will be requisite to say something of the true reason which induced the king to resolve upon a second marriage. As the intrigues, supported by money from the ministers, maintained a Spanish party at Lisbon, so there wanted not a Portuguese faction amongst the nobility of Spain, who, in their own sentiments at least, acted intirely from public spirit. Of these the chief was the duke of Medina Sidonia, brother to the queen of Portugal, who had spoke so advantageously of his nephew Don Theodysius de Bragança, prince of Brazil, that some, who were very desirous of seeing Portugal once more united to the territories of Castile, had begun to figure to themselves that the thing was not at all impossible, if a marriage could be brought about between this amiable prince and the infanta Maria Teresa, now the presumptive heir of the Spanish monarchy. As this was a project that never could be rendered so much as communicable, much less acceptable, to Philip IV. they were driven into consultations and practices, criminal in appearance at least, if not in their nature, and, as such, are seldom long concealed, the king and his ministers obtained such informations, that the principal persons embarked in this design were seized. The duke of Medina Sidonia is said to have preserved his life by discovering all who were engaged with him. The duke of Hijar, of the house of Silva, and, by his mother's side, of the royal family of Arragon, was put to the question ordinary and extraordinary, which he bore with patience and with silence, but perished nevertheless by a long and severe imprisonment. The marquis de Ayamonte, Don Carlos de Padilla, and some other persons of distinction, paid with their heads for this irregular instance of their zeal for the tranquillity and welfare of their country, and taught the king how much it imported him to have issue male, to prevent his dominions from falling into some other house; the fear of which continued to embitter the remaining part of his life, even when the contingency seemed to be no longer probable <sup>d</sup>.

The king
marries
the archduchess Mary Anne of Austria,
daughter
to the emperor.

THE peace of Munster, which, after so many years of war, had restored quiet to the empire, served only to augment the chagrin of the court of Madrid, where the terms on which France would have concluded peace, were rejected, and all the share that Spain took, after so long a negotiation in that transaction, was insisting upon her protest. The principal motive to this conduct was that confusion to which France has been ever liable under a minority, and where, at this time, the malecontents were able to cover their designs with the specious pretence that the queen regent was a Spaniard, and the cardinal minister an Italian. But these strangers had the interest of France so much at heart, that the Spaniards chose rather to treat with the parliament of Paris, by which they exceedingly embarrassed the court, where, notwithstanding all their victories, they found it extremely difficult to form and maintain an army; and, when this was done, they were again embarrassed to find a general. The archduke Leopold William gave out that it was in his power to make considerable conquests in France; and, to render this probable, he ravaged it; which, in truth, was all that he had in his power. However, he recovered Ipres and St. Venant by the 10th of May; but at last the French army appeared under the count de Harcourt, who invested Cambray, and having intercepted a letter from the archduke to the governor, promising relief by a day fixed, he caused it to be published, as the shortest way to prevent it; notwithstanding which, the archduke presented himself before the place, performed what he had promised, and forced the French to raise the siege; after which they took Conde, but were forced to abandon it again almost as soon as it was taken <sup>e</sup>. In Italy, the Spaniards compelled the duke of Modena to change sides; for France could do nothing in Catalonia. Don Juan de Guaras, who commanded the troops of his catholic majesty, took several places in the neighbourhood of Barcelona, and would probably also have become master of that capital, if marshal de Marsin had not brought into it a French garrison, which prevented any commotion, and thereby saved the place, till France should be in a condition to do more. On the 3d of September, prince Edward of Portugal, brother to the king, ended his days miserably in the castle of Milan, where he was kept prisoner by the Spaniards, for no other crime than that of his birth, unless we should add his having qualities equal, and a spirit even superior, to it. In the month of October arrived the new queen of Spain, to whom the king had been married by proxy. The contagious distemper, with which the kingdom had been afflicted, ceased in the winter.

1649.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de Madame de Motteville, tom. ii. p. 339, & suiv. <sup>e</sup> BATT NANI.

THE dissensions that raged in France afforded king Philip Affairs and his ministers all the advantages they could desire in all take a the countries where the war was carried on. In Italy, Don very unexpected turn in Catalonia. in favour of the Spaniards.
Juan of Austria took Piombino by assault, and afterwards besieged Porto Longone, into which, in spite of all the opposition given him by the Spanish fleet, the chevalier de St. Paul threw supplies; which, however, did not hinder the place from being reduced. On the side of Portugal, there passed as usual but little of importance; and, as some say, time has discovered that Don Juan had a secret correspondence with some of the Spanish ministers, which occasioned that inactivity, favourable to him in some respects, upon the whole perhaps necessary, but which at the time was far from being acceptable to his subjects. The reception of prince Maurice and prince Rupert in Portugal induced king Philip not only to acknowledge, but to make court to, the new government in England, in order to engage them to send an English fleet against the Portuguese; which they did; and, in process of time, Philip was severely chastised by that very power which he now flattered. In Catalonia, affairs took a strange turn: the French general Marsin was but weak, and therefore could not hinder the retaking of some places of no importance; but, being a creature of the prince of Conde's, he no sooner heard of his imprisonment than he began to promote what was not in his power to prevent. The Catalans, finding themselves pushed by their old masters, and betrayed by their new ones, entered into a variety of intrigues, as their interests, their inclinations, or their necessities, directed. By these means the Spaniards recovered Flix upon the Segro, Tortosa, and some other places, and very probably had recovered the whole province, if, in this critical conjuncture, the kingdom of Valentia had not revolted, which obliged the Spanish ministers to turn their eyes on that side, where, not without difficulty, things were appeased <sup>k</sup>. The duke de Mercoeur, arriving at Barcelona with the title of viceroy, secured that city, after having caused Marfin to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Perpignan; notwithstanding which, the Spaniards, being masters of the whole plain of Urgel, most of the Catalan chiefs, who had been faithful to the French, thought it prudent to retire into Roussillon; by which, as it was extremely natural, their party was exceedingly discouraged <sup>l</sup>.

1650.

The viscount de Turenne enters into their service, and is beat by marshal du Plessis Praslin.

WE deferred speaking of the affairs on the side of Flanders, because they require somewhat more room. The archduke Leopold William saw, with some surprise, an intire change in the affairs of France, his old friends closing with the court, and the duke of Orleans concurring in the measure of arresting the princes of Conde and Conti, and the duke of Longueville. This did not at all trouble him, since the new malecontents threw themselves immediately into the arms of Spain; and, in consequence of a new treaty, concluded between madame de Longueville and the archduke, the famous viscount de Turenne (for he was already famous) joined the archduke as soon as he took the field, and, after reducing Aubenton and Irson, took Capelet on the 15th of June; notwithstanding which, the archduke was obliged by the marshal du Plessis Praslin to raise the siege of Guise, on the first of July. His army, however, being reinforced, took Capelle on the 3d of August; after which the viscount de Turenne sent a strong detachment to deliver the princes out of the castle of Vincennes, which was prevented by transferring them to Marcouffi. The archduke, however, made himself master of Monçon, after a vigorous defence; and, under colour of having full powers from Spain, set on foot a new treaty, as dangerous to the court as his victories. At length the marshal du Plessis Praslin having retaken Rethel, the archduke and the viscount Turenne gave him battle on the 15th of December, and were beat with great loss: in this engagement Turenne very narrowly escaped being killed or taken, which put an end to the campaign, but not to the intrigues on this side <sup>m</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> BATT NANI.

<sup>l</sup> MARTINIERE.

<sup>m</sup> LE CLERG.

As the confusions in France were at the greatest height, their finances exhausted, the persons of the king and his mother scarce in safety, and their minister on the point of seeking shelter in Germany, we cannot have a more convincing proof of the weakness of Spain than arises from the small advantages she was able to make from circumstances so much in her favour. We cannot charge this with justice either on the ministers or the generals she employed; for they were certainly able men, and indefatigable in their endeavours; but the length of the war, the great distance of the different scenes of action, and, above all, the prodigious sums that were given from time to time to the French malecontents, were such as could not be supplied without impoverishing the people, who were at the same time consumed by pestilence and famine. On the whole, therefore, king Philip and his ministers knew not how to act, even in places where they were sure of meeting with little or no resistance. In Italy, to save expences, and to prevent jealousies, they withdrew their forces out of Piedmont, and contented themselves with securing the Milanese. On the side of Portugal they were able to do nothing; on the contrary, their forces were so weak, that they might have suffered extremely, if they had not had two things in their favour; first, that their frontiers were so ruined that the enemy had nothing either to tempt or to subvert them; and next, that the Portuguese were in a worse state than themselves. In Catalonia, they exerted themselves under the command of the marquis de Mortara, and with success in the spring: in the autumn, the count de Marfin, who was again at the head of the French troops, marched away with the whole army to join the prince of Conde in Guienne, leaving the Catalans to defend themselves as well as they could<sup>a</sup>. Upon this, Don Juan of Austria, recalled from Italy, on purpose to command on that side, formed the siege of Barcelona. In the Low Countries, through which cardinal Mazarine passed in his way to Cologne, the archduke, with the assistance of his great minister the count de Fuenfaldagna, proposed some great exploits; which, however, in spite of all their efforts, produced only the conquest of Furnes, St. Winoc, and some other little places, which opened a passage to the reduction of Dunkirk, the siege of which the advance of the season would not permit them to undertake. To all their other cares the Spanish ministry had now added a new scene of war in the very heart of France,

New dis- contents in France, upon which the prince of Conde joins with Spain.
1651.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire Generale d'Espagne. Le Siecle de Louis XIV.
BATT NANI.

in consequence of a treaty made between his catholic majesty and the prince of Conde, to whose assistance a squadron of seventeen large vessels, filled with troops, stores, and money, was sent from St. Sebastian to Bordeaux. King Philip, however, had the consolation of seeing his young queen brought to bed, on the 12th of July, of the infant Donna Maria Margareta, who became afterwards the consort of the emperor Leopold, and the grandmother of the reigning empress queen °.

Vast advantages that accrued to that nation from those intrigues and discontents.

1652.

It is generally allowed, that Don Lewis de Haro was much inferior, as a politician, to his uncle the conde duke; but it is certain that he managed his intrigues with greater success, and drew much higher advantages from the troubles he fomented in France. In Italy, some impression was made by the marquis de Carracena upon Piedmont; and Cazal, which Olivares could never get into his hands, was surrendered, the town through treachery, the citadel from famine, to the Spaniards, who restored it immediately to the duke of Mantua, upon his promise to preserve it by a garrison of his own troops only P. On the side of Bordeaux, the prince of Conde received all the succours that were in their power to give, and when he traversed the kingdom, to throw himself into Paris, they furnished the expence, and received him with open arms, when resentment, and the want of any other resource, compelled him to seek shelter in their armies. They had, to say the truth, great reason; for Gravelines had surrendered to the archduke, after sixty-nine days siege; other places of less consequence were taken with less trouble; but, even in the midst of their confusion, the French did all that was in their power to save Dunkirk, in which there was a good garrison, commanded by the count d'Estrades 9. The duke de Vendosme was sent with a good fleet to relieve it; but the English met with them in their passage, and, except three ships that escaped to Flushing, took them all, under colour of reprisals. This was the only service king Philip received from the parliament, in return for the extraordinary step he had taken in their favour, or, which is more probable, because it was believed to be rather the interest of England to have Dunkirk in the hands of Spain than of France. However that might be, the place was surrendered on the 16th of September, after a siege of thirty-nine days 1. The prince of Conde, having joined the Spanish army, took, ° Histoire Chronologique du dernier Siecle.

P MARTI-

NIEPPE. 9 BATT NANI,

1 CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion.

tho' it was late in the season, Rethel and St. Menchoude; but the design he had of giving their forces winter-quarters in France was prevented by Turenne. The campaign, however, was very fortunate, and the recovery of so many and so important places did no small honour to the archduke's.

THE Spaniards did little this year against the Portuguese; Barcelona and the king of Portugal, according to his old maxim, persisted in putting his kingdom into a good state of defence, in every respect, rather than run any unnecessary hazards for the present. In Catalonia, Dön Juan of Austria besieged Barcelona with a small army, and kept it blocked up by a squadron of gallees at sea. The French marshal la Mothe penetrated through his quarters with a reinforcement of between six and seven hundred men, which raised the spirits of the besieged for the present, but increased the scarcity of provisions. The French fleet attempted its relief without success; and at length, after a siege of fifteen months, Barcelona surrendered, on the 11th of October, the French garrison having good terms given them, and the inhabitants, who really compelled the surrender, had a general pardon, and their privileges secured. The whole country, except Roses, followed the fate of the capital. His catholic majesty held an assembly of the military orders, and afterwards of the states of the kingdom, at Madrid, in which some necessary resolutions were taken, and some good laws were made. His ministers also took care to circulate in France their manifestoes, in his catholic majesty's name, setting forth his earnest desire of peace, his abhorrence of contributing in any manner to the disturbance of his neighbours, and the purity of his intention of supporting the princes of France against the open violences and secret artifices of an Italian politician, who, to maintain his own greatness, and to promote his private views, trampled upon the laws of France, and kept her involved in war with her neighbours.

THE marquis de Carracena had some advantages in the beginning of the year, which, however, did not hinder him from consenting to a short cessation of arms; a circumstance that was highly advantageous to the French, who sent the marquis du Plessis Belliere, with a small corps of troops, to secure Piedmont, and to harraß the Spaniards. The marquis de Carracena, with superior forces, brought him to a battle on the banks of the Requette, where both sides claimed the

• MARTINIERE.
NANI.
NIERE.

• STEVENS'S Suppl.
w Histoire Generale d'Espagne.

* BATT
x MARTI-

victory;

victory; but the marquis being wounded, and able to make no progress during the rest of the year, we may venture to affirm his claim was not extremely well founded <sup>y</sup>. In Guienne, the prince of Conde's faction began to crumble to nothing; and tho' the Spaniards had a garrison in Bourg, the French sent a squadron to Bordeaux; by which the place was blocked up at sea. The marshal Marfin, who commanded for the prince in those parts, was able to do nothing of consequence; and at length the duke of Vendosme appearing with a superior naval force, the Spaniards were constrained to retire. Bourg, in which they had a garrison, was taken, and the people of Bordeaux made their peace upon the best terms they could <sup>z</sup>. In the Low Countries, this campaign was by no means so favourable as that of the preceding year. The prince of Conde did indeed make himself master of Rocroy, and some other places; but monsieur de Turenne prevented him from doing any thing of consequence; and the count de Fuensaldagna having hindered him from fighting, because he thought the risque too great, produced a difference between them that could never be composed; more especially after the archduke Leopold arrived in the army, where, by the express directions of the court of Madrid, he was constrained to treat the prince as his equal, and be content at last to act upon the defensive, the young king Lewis XIV. coming in person to encourage his troops, and bringing with him such supplies as rendered them superior in every respect <sup>a</sup>; which the vicinity of his dominions, in comparison of those of Spain, made the thing extremely easy.

Don Juan
raises the siege of Gironne,
and marshal Hoc-quincourt relieves Roses.

THERE passed little of consequence between the Spaniards and Portuguese, and, in the few skirmishes that did happen, the advantage was, generally speaking, on the side of the latter. In Catalonia, the Spaniards, having for some time blocked up Roses, proposed to besiege it; but their army being very weak, the French, who were also far from being numerous, compelled them to retire. This success engaged the marshal de Hocquincourt to penetrate through Roussillon into Catalonia, where he laid siege to Gironne on the 27th of July. He remained before it two months, when the place, being reduced to the last extremity, was relieved by Don Juan of Austria, who forced one of the quarters of the French camp, and compelled the marshal to retire into Roussillon.

<sup>y</sup> QUINCY Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire Generale d'Espagne. <sup>z</sup> MARTINIERE. <sup>a</sup> Hist. du Vicomte de Turenne, Marechal General des Armées du Roy, par M. DE RAMSAY.

with great precipitation; but, notwithstanding this advantage, Don Juan was forced to do the very same thing before Roses, partly through the rigour of the season, and partly through the eagerness of the French marshal to recover his reputation, and to keep such of the Catalans as were still inclined to France from falling into absolute despair<sup>b</sup>. In both the vigilance and vigour he shewed on this occasion answered perfectly his intent.

THE court of Madrid, at the request of the prince of Charles Conde, had released from his imprisonment the duke of Guise, <sup>duke of Lorraine</sup> who gave them so much trouble at Naples, and he made them very magnificent promises in return<sup>c</sup>. He went into France, <sup>arrested in the Low Countries, and sent prisoner into</sup> and, during these troublesome times, behaved himself so much to the satisfaction of the court, that he was promised the command of a fleet for the execution of a certain secret expedition of his own contriving. This provoked the Spanish <sup>Spain.</sup> ministers, but the duke was out of their reach; and this, it is thought, made them treat another prince more severely than was in it. Charles duke of Lorraine had a strong affection for the house of Austria, which induced the French to deprive him of his dominions. He retained, however, a considerable corps of troops, with whom he served the crown of Spain, but in so capricious a manner, and with such an apparent jealousy of the prince of Conde, that his catholic majesty's orders were transmitted to the Low Countries to put him under arrest. He was enterprising, and yet suspicious and cautious; however, ways and means were found to deceive him, and to separate his troops; after which he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Brussels, transferred from thence to Dunkirk, afterwards conveyed to Spain, and confined in the castle of Toledo, till, upon the treaty of the Pyrenees, he was set at liberty<sup>d</sup>. The archduke, who would take no share in this business, was obliged to lend his name to a manifesto published in vindication of it. Prince Francis of Lorraine took the command of his brother's troops, and continued in his catholic majesty's service. The archduke accompanied, or rather directed, by the prince of Conde, very early this year, and unexpectedly, besieged Arras, while the French besieged Stenai. However, monsieur Turenne forced the Spanish camp before Arras, and obliged the archduke and the prince to raise the siege on the 25th of August; notwithstanding which, the Spaniards reduced several places this year, and still kept up a very troublesome party in France<sup>e</sup>. All the respect, however,

1654.

<sup>b</sup> BATT NANI. <sup>c</sup> CESPICES. <sup>d</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vi. p. ii. p. 264. <sup>e</sup> MARTINIER.

ever, that could be paid to the prince of Conde was far from giving him content: he complained that the Spanish troops were not complete; that the sums assigned for their pay were too little, and those not punctually issued; that they had not the necessary trains of artillery; that ammunition was frequently wanted, and most of their fortresses poorly garrisoned, and out of repair. They answered with fair promises; but, as these were not kept, the prince began to grow weary of his situation, more especially when he found that Cromwell was negotiating with France, from whence he foresaw that the Spaniards would feel many inconveniences, and be gradually less able to support him and his designs, which induced him to think of making his peace at home; of which the Spaniards having some intimation, it augmented their jealousy, and contributed not a little to embarrass and perplex their affairs<sup>f</sup>:

Affairs in Spain in a very declining condition, which disposes the court to peace.

THE Portuguese this year took and plundered the town of Oliva, and broke the agreement that had subsisted for some time with the Spanish generals, of not disturbing the country-people on either side; which induced, or rather compelled, the latter to make incursions likewise; notwithstanding which there happened little of moment. Don Juan of Austria was not able to do any great matter on the side of Roussillon, where the prince of Conti commanded. But the attempt made by the duke of Guise with a fleet to reduce Naples, proved altogether ineffectual, and exposed both him and cardinal Mazarine to ridicule<sup>g</sup>. His catholic majesty caused his daughter the infanta to be acknowledged the heiress of all his dominions, and finished the fine chapel at the Escorial at a vast expence, notwithstanding the affairs of his government suffered every-where for want of money, most of his revenues being anticipated, and his subjects every-where in a manner exhausted; so that peace became every day more necessary, and at the same time seemed to be farther off than ever<sup>h</sup>. Endeavours were used to set on foot a negotiation, by the pope's mediation, which was very coldly received in France.

Many reasons conspire to make the archduke desirous of

IN Italy, as there was little done the last year, the marquis de Carracena had taken the necessary precautions to be in a condition to act with greater vigour at the entrance of this. He had intelligence of the duke of Modena's having entered into a treaty with France, and of his concluding a marriage for his eldest son with the niece of cardinal Mazarine; upon

<sup>f</sup> CESPINES.
History of Portugal.

<sup>g</sup> STEVENS'S Continuation of Soufa's
<sup>h</sup> BATT NANI, MARTINIERE,
which

which he demanded one of the best places in his dominions, quitting by way of security for his conduct, and advanced with all the Low the forces he could draw together towards Reggio, where the Coun- duke then was; but the duke quickly found him other em- tries. ployment, by putting himself at the head of his forces, and 1655. marching directly towards Pavia, before which place arrived at the same time prince Thomas of Savoy, with the French troops, and the marquis de Villa, with those of Piedmont. The place was invested on the first of August; but the governor count Trotti, having a good garrison, made so gallant a defence, that he gave the marquis de Carracena time to expect reinforcements from Naples and from Germany, and, with their help, he obliged the allies to raise the siege. The duke of Modena, however, retired to Cazal; and so low was the credit of the Spaniards fallen in Italy, that, notwithstanding this advantage, the duke of Mantua declared for the French, and actually went to Paris to settle the terms upon which he was to enjoy the protection of that court <sup>i</sup>. In the Low Countries, the archduke and the prince of Conde flattered themselves with great hopes; but when they came to take the field, they found themselves much disappointed; for monsieur Turenne besieged and took Landrecy, and afterwards Quenoi. The French king was himself in the field; and the superiority of his arms so great, that, notwithstanding all the opposition the archduke and the prince could give, without running the hazard of a battle, Conde and St. Guelan were added to his conquests <sup>k</sup>. In the winter, the archduke received still greater mortifications. The court of Spain had concluded a new treaty with their prisoner the duke of Lorraine at Toledo, which was transmitted to the archduke, and both he and the prince of Conde flattered themselves, that, a new oath of fidelity being exacted from these troops, they might be safely employed in an enterprize which they had concerted. Duke Francis, however, having sent his second son, who was a child, to Breda, escaped with the eldest into the territories of France, and all the Lorraine troops, that had not deserted before, followed him thither, where they took an oath of fidelity to the French king, till their sovereign should be set at liberty <sup>l</sup>. At this very time, that is, in the beginning of November, it was known that the protector Cromwell, in spite of all that could be offered by ministers both from Madrid and Brussels, had concluded a

<sup>i</sup> MARTINIERE, CESPIDES.
Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY. MARTINIERE.
NANI, MARTINIERE, CESPIDES.

<sup>k</sup> Histoire du Vicomte de
<sup>l</sup> BATT

treaty with France; with which unacceptable news the archduke acquainted the people of the Low Countries by a manifesto, and at the same time issued commissions to privateers<sup>m</sup>. These mortifications, added to those which he daily received from the count de Fuenfaldagna, who had in reality the confidence of the Spanish court, engaged the archduke to press his catholic majesty so warmly for his leave to quit the Low Countries, where he was able to do so little for his majesty's service, and still less for his own reputation, that at length he obtained it, and an assurance that a successor should be sent him in the spring<sup>n</sup>; a measure by no means acceptable to the nobility or people in the Spanish provinces, where the archduke was generally and deservedly beloved.

His catholic majesty resolves to make some changes in the persons who hold commands. THE war with Portugal furnished this year no incident of importance, except we may account so the proceeding of the Portuguese governor of Salvaterra, whom the Spaniards would have corrupted by the agency of Don Alonso de Sande, a Castilian officer, with whom he lived in great friendship, the Portuguese having carried on the negotiation till he had obtained a letter under the hand of Don Lewis de Haro, consenting to admit the person with whom he treated, and thirty men, at a postern; which he performed, and caused every man's brains to be beat out as soon as he was within. As for the unfortunate Don Alonso, he tied him to the mouth of a cannon filled with gunpowder, and shattered him all to pieces; an action so barbarous, that it tarnished the reputation he would otherwise have acquired from his fidelity<sup>o</sup>. Don Juan of Austria was early in the field on the side of Roussillon, where he took some small places, and would have made greater progress, if the prince of Conti had not been the cardinal's nephew, who took care to furnish him with a numerous army, and sent likewise the duke of Vendosme upon the coast with a strong fleet. With his assistance he took Quiers and Castillon, after a siege of twenty days. He then prepared to penetrate into Catalonia; but Don Juan, though much inferior in strength, had so well secured the passes, that he found it impracticable; however, the town of Solsona revolted, and received a French garrison. The siege of Palamos was next resolved on; but Don Juan threw in such a reinforcement, as would have made the reduction a work of time; and this put the prince of Conti so much out of humour, that he quitted the command to the count de Merinville<sup>p</sup>. Don Juan, desirous of punishing Solsona for its revolt, besieged it soon after the prince's departure; but the count de Merinville surprised one of his quarters, and relieved the place. Don Juan, however, took Berga, and, after a long campaign, forced the French to retire into Languedoc, where they took up their winter-quarters. After their departure he reduced Solsona, and gave its inhabitants cause to remember their having been so ready to receive a French garrison<sup>q</sup>. There happened also this year a naval engagement, of which neither side had much reason to boast. Some French historians claim the victory; but, from what happened through the whole campaign, it is easy to see that their title was none of the best. His catholic majesty resolved to make some changes in his governors and general officers the next year; his son Don Juan of Austria he appointed governor of the Low Countries, with a plenitude of power never granted to any of his predecessors<sup>r</sup>. He made choice of the marquis de Carracena to serve under him, in hopes he might prove more successful there than hitherto he had been in Italy. The count de Fuensaldagna, with whom the ministry were well satisfied, had the government of the Milanese, for Don Juan did not affect a servant who had held his former master in leading-strings. The Spanish privateers gave already a great deal of disturbance; the treaty with the duke of Lorrain, signed on the 9th of November, proved of no use, as has been already shewn. However, a medal was struck by order of the court of Madrid, with the bust of the king and his titles on one side, and a drawn sword and branch of olive on the other, with this inscription, Prepared for either<sup>s</sup>. It was thought, however, that this medal rather spoke a wish than a fact.

<sup>m</sup> Corps Univ. Diplomatique, tom. vi. P. ii. p. 121. MARTINIERE, CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion, BATT NANI.
<sup>n</sup> CESPIDES. <sup>o</sup> STEVEN'S Continuation of Sousa's Hist. of Portugal.

THE count de Fuensaldagna found the affairs of the Mi- Mortifica*lanese* in no very promising situation. The army was weak, tion of the revenue anticipated, the inhabitants of the capital ex- count Futremely displeased with the accidental burning of the ducal ensal-palace, and all the papers of state contained therein. He set dagna at himself to repair every thing, and he made a great progress the loss of in what he undertook; for though without doubt he was Valenza very assuming, yet he was a great man in the cabinet and in in the Mi-lanese.

<sup>p</sup> BATT NANI.
VILLE.

<sup>r</sup> CESPIDES.

<sup>q</sup> LE CLERC, BASNAGE, NEU-
<sup>s</sup> Histoire Metallique des Pays Bas, par GERARD VAN LOON, tom. ii. p. 396.

1656.

the field, and very few ministers were so assiduous<sup>t</sup>. The duke of Modena had made a tour to Paris, in order to be present at his son's marriage; and, as this procured him some advantages, it turned likewise to the account of Spain; for the duke of Mantua, jealous of the honours paid him, gradually reconciled himself to his old friends<sup>u</sup>. Prince Thomas of Savoy being dead on the verge of fourscore, the duke of Merccœur, at the request of the duke of Modena, was appointed to command in Italy, and, with a flourishing army, besieged Valenza, a strong place in the Milanese. It was defended by Don Augustino de Signado, and defended with equal capacity and courage. The count de Fuenfaldagna did all in his power to relieve it, and was once very near carrying his point; but at length the place was reduced to such extremity, that the governor demanded to capitulate. The two dukes answered, that, according to the rules of war, he had no terms to expect; but that, out of pure regard to his courage and conduct, they were ready to grant him what terms he pleased; and thus, to the great regret of the Spaniards, Valenza was lost, after seventy-three days open trenches. This was looked upon as one of the best conducted enterprizes during the whole war; and though no blame could with any foundation be laid upon the count de Fuenfaldagna, it proved notwithstanding a great mortification to him, more especially as it happened at his entrance on the government, and as he very well knew they had formed at Madrid great expectations of seeing their affairs in Italy restored by a person of his known courage and capacity<sup>w</sup>.

Success of Don Juan
of Austria
and the prince of Conde in
the Low
Countries.

THE situation of affairs in the Low Countries requiring the presence of Don Juan, he resolved to pass by sea into Italy, and from thence by land into the Netherlands. We cannot desire a clearer proof of the great change in the circumstances of Spain, than this short voyage will afford us. Instead of the numerous squadrons of the Doria's or Mendoza's, which attended every motion of Charles the fifth and Philip the second, Don Juan put to sea with only four galleys. These were soon attacked by privateers of such force, that three of them were quickly taken, and the fourth, with the prince on board, had been taken likewise, if Don Juan had not promised the slaves their liberty, and one hundred ducats apiece, if they landed him safe. Thus encouraged,

<sup>t</sup> BATT NANI.
QUINCY.

<sup>u</sup> CESPIDES.

<sup>w</sup> MARTINIERE,

they

they exerted themselves in such a manner, that with great difficulty they merited their reward<sup>x</sup>. The prince no sooner debarked than he continued his route to Milan, where, notwithstanding the highest honours were paid him, he staid but a few days, and spent the best part of his time in conferring with the count de Fuenfaldagna, whose informations he received very thankfully, and heard his advice with much attention. As soon as he arrived in the Low Countries, the archduke Leopold William went to wait upon him, and, having met him at some miles distance, in a most triumphant manner carried him to Brussels, where he was received with universal applause; soon after which the archduke set out for Cologne, Don Juan accompanying him as far as he came to meet him<sup>y</sup>. These ceremonies were not without a meaning, for it was known that the prince of Conde pretended to the precedence; but the archduke, who was both the son and the brother of an emperor, having given Don Juan the right hand, the prince made no difficulty of following his example. However, these forms took up so much time, that the French were in the field before them; and the viscount Turenne, having left the cardinal with the court at la Fere, though his army was not very numerous, had invested Valenciennes, a large and well-fortified place, in the midst of the Spanish fortresses. It was defended by Don Francisco de Menceses, who had the precaution to lay the adjacent meadows under water; so that the French were constrained to lay a bridge, or rather to construct a dike, over them, to unite their quarters, the viscount de Turenne commanding on one side, and marshal de la Ferté on the other. About the beginning of July Don Juan, the prince of Conde, and the marquis de Carracena, advanced to its relief, and encamped at a small distance from the quarter of the Lorrainers, which it was expected they would have attacked; but, having caused bridges to be thrown over the Scheld, they passed it in the night between the 15th and 16th, and attacked the quarter of the marshal la Ferté so briskly, that in a quarter of an hour the line was forced, and the marshal taken prisoner<sup>z</sup>. At the very instant of this attack, the governor opened the sluices, which carried a barge laden with stones with such rapidity against the French dike, that it forced a passage; so that Monsieur Turenne, finding it impossible to succour his colleague, retired with his baggage and part of his artillery under the cannon of Quenoi. The princes would have pursued him, and in all probability would have rendered their victory complete, if unluckily the gate of Valenciennes on that side had not been walled up, and, before it could be opened, the viscount was out of their reach<sup>a</sup>. As it was, a marshal of France taken, with four thousand foot, with as many killed, and all the artillery and baggage falling likewise into their hands, gave a new lustre to the Spanish arms. This was not a little augmented by the taking of Conde, after a siege of twenty five days, in which there was a garrison of four thousand men, who were indeed suffered to march out, but upon the hard condition of not serving against Spain for four years. These successes were somewhat qualified by their being obliged to raise the siege of St. Guilian, in hopes of preventing Monsieur Turenne from recovering la Capelle, in which they likewise failed<sup>b</sup>. However, the events of this campaign were apparently in their favour, and this revived the spirits of the Flemings, and in some measure abated the chagrin of the prince of Conde.

<sup>x</sup> PARIVAL, Siecle de Fer, tom. i. p. 135. <sup>y</sup> AITZEMA, Zaaken van staat en oorl, iii. deel, fo. 1314. PARIVAL, tom. ii. p. 234. <sup>z</sup> DE REINCOURT, Hist. de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 274—276. Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY, QUINCY.

The propositions of peace made by M. de Lionne are rejected by the court of Spain.

If the former campaigns had been at all more vigorous, we might have imputed the little progress made in this on the side of Portugal to the declining health of the king Don Juan, who died in November; but in truth they were all the effects of his wise policy, who, having a broken state to repair, and wars in different parts of the world to maintain, thought it best to save expences on that side where the weakness of his enemy was as great as his own. In Catalonia the marquis de Montana, who commanded after the departure of Don Juan, had but a very small army, with which he took several little places; and the duke de Candale, grandson to the great duke of Epernon, who commanded the French, neither attempted any thing himself, nor gave the Spanish general much disturbance. Pope Urban the seventh having solicited the French bishops to interpose with their king, in order to facilitate a peace, Lewis afforded them but a rough, not to say a rude answer. Upon reflection, however, cardinal Mazarine thought it expedient to let the world see that France did not intend, or at least would not avow the intention, of making a war without end; therefore, at the beginning of the campaign, Mr. de Lionne was dispatched to Madrid with full powers, comprised in about six lines, to conclude a peace; and, to prevent any doubt about the king's signature, a gentleman, who had been in the service of the count de Fuenfaldagna, in whose presence the French king delivered those powers, and told him what they were, accompanied him <sup>c</sup>. This minister plenipotentiary had several conferences with Don Lewis de Haro, but they ended in nothing. An account of this negotiation was published, as is generally supposed, by Lionne, in order to justify his court; and in this it is affirmed, that the point upon which they differed was the restitution of his places and governments to the prince of Conde, to which it is said his catholic majesty inclined to add the sovereignty of some places on the frontiers, in consideration of the services which, as the Spanish ministers phrased it, he had been compelled to render their master: whereas Lewis, though he was content the prince should return, would by no means allow that he should return in triumph. It has been however thought, and indeed it is more probable, that the true reason why this negotiation ended so abruptly was, the proposition, or at least the intimation, of a marriage between the young king and the infanta, to which Philip was exceedingly averse, as foreseeing the consequences, and being desirous to marry her to a prince of his own family <sup>d</sup>. The Spaniards were made thoroughly sensible this year of the consequences of a war with England; for, besides the news of the attempt upon St. Domingo, and the conquest of Jamaica in the West Indies, they had the misfortune of seeing the admirals Blake and Mountague sink three and take two rich galleons upon their own coast, in which prizes they found three millions of pieces of eight, besides which the Spaniards lost a greater sum in those that were sunk <sup>e</sup>. A misfortune so much the more intolerable, as they knew not what provocation had brought this war upon them, and consequently knew as little how to extricate themselves from it, or to revenge the mischiefs they sustained.

<sup>a</sup> AITZEMA, Zaaken van staat en oorl, iii. deel, fol. 1314.

<sup>b</sup> QUINCY, Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, MARTINIERE.

THE duke of Mantua, though he had contributed exceedingly the year before to the taking of Valenza, was prevailed upon by his wife to go to Milan, where he was quickly reconciled to the interests of Spain; and, having discovered this by acting openly, the duke of Modena and the prince of Conti began to commit hostilities in his dominions. As they

Affairs go very differently for the Spaniard in Italy

<sup>c</sup> STEVENS's Continuation of Soufa's History of Portugal, Histoire de la Paix des Pyrenees, Cologne, 1667. pag. 15. QUINCY, tom. i. p. 217.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de LIONNE, CESPIDES.

<sup>e</sup> LORD CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques.

and the Low
Countries.

1657.

had visibly a superiority, they proceeded to invest Alexandria della Paglia, a strong place, and well defended. The count de Fuenfaldagna assembled all the forces he was able, and marched with them to the relief of the place; in order to which he attacked the enemy in their lines, but without effect. However, having taken a strong intrenched camp very near them, and the governor continuing to make frequent sallies, they were obliged at last to raise the siege on the 18th of August, after having lain before the place thirty-three days<sup>f</sup>. The count, however, was not strong enough to prevent the allies from taking quarters in the dominions of the duke of Mantua. On the side of Flanders, through the industry and activity of the prince of Conde, the army was very early in the field, so that St. Guilain was invested, and reduced by the 22d of March. Marshal Turenne, to repair this affront, having deceived the Spanish generals, began to invest Cambray, in which there were not above three hundred men; and had certainly taken it in a few days, if the prince of Conde had not marched thither with incredible diligence, at the head of 4500 horse and dragoons, and, under the cover of a thick fog, penetrating the French line, got into the place; upon which Monsieur Turenne drew off his troops to cover the siege of Montmedi by marshal la Ferté, which was taken on the 6th. of August. In the mean time Don Juan of Austria and the prince of Conde attempted to surprise Calais, and actually gained possession of the lower town; but the upper was so well defended, that they were forced to retire. Turenne afterwards took St. Venant, and came time enough to oblige the Spaniards, who had laid siege to Ardres, to raise it; but they were so lucky as to surprise his rear-guard; and, with it, the military chest. This did not hinder him from besieging and taking Mardyke, which surrendered on the 3d of October. The garrison, being made prisoners of war, were sent over to England, and the place delivered to general Morgan, who commanded the auxiliaries sent by the protector, which had served in the French army all this campaign<sup>g</sup>. The emperor Ferdinand dying in the spring, the archduke Leopold, formerly governor of the Low Countries, might have succeeded him, if he had not declined it in favour of his nephew of the same name, who, notwithstanding, through the opposition excited by the French, was not elected till the following year. Don Juan laboured assiduously to improve a misunderstanding between the states general and the crown of France into an open rupture; but the former, apprehending the consequences, and knowing the inability of the Spaniards to perform their promises, adjusted it upon the best terms they could <sup>h</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Histoire du Prince de Conde, REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. QUINCY, Histoire du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY.

<sup>g</sup> Lord CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion, PARIVAL, Siecle de Fer, tom. ii. p. 381.

As the Portuguese suspected their enemies might be encouraged by the death of their king, and the minority of the prince his son, they determined to begin the campaign early, and with vigour; but, miscarrying in their attempt to surprise a Spanish fort, they drew upon themselves the mischief they sought to avoid; for the duke de St. Germain, an Italian nobleman of great merit, who commanded the Spanish army, being sent for to Madrid, received instructions to exert himself to the utmost, and was at the same time promised great supplies and considerable reinforcements, which were accordingly sent him. Towards the close of April he took the field, and soon after invested Olivenza, the strongest place in Portugal except Elvas. The count de St. Lorenzo, with the army of Portugal, made several attempts to relieve it, but without success; so that after a long defence it surrendered on the 30th of May, for which the governor Don Manuel de Saldanha was banished. The inhabitants, to shew their antipathy to the Spaniards, though permitted by the capitulation to stay, quitted the place to a man. The duke next invested the town and castle of Moron, which he likewise took; so that this was the most active and successful campaign since the beginning of the war <sup>i</sup>. The marquis de St. Abreo, who commanded in Catalonia in the absence of the duke of Candale, forced the Spanish troops, who were employed in the blockade of Urgel, to retire; and, as their forces were very weak, and such great efforts made on the side of Portugal, there was nothing more done. But the most fatal event of the whole year was the burning the Spanish galleons by the English fleet under the command of admiral Blake, in the island of Teneriff, by which many millions were lost, as well as a great number of good ships, which the Spaniards could very ill spare <sup>k</sup>. These misfortunes, however, seemed to be all buried in oblivion at Ma*drid*, on the queen's being delivered on the 28th of November of a prince, who was baptized by the name of Philip Prosper, to the general satisfaction of the king and his subjects <sup>1</sup>.

<sup>h</sup> Histoire du Cardinal Mazarine, QUINCY, LE CLERC, BASNAGE, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par M. VOLTAIRE. <sup>i</sup> STEVENS's Continuation of Sousa's History of Portugal. <sup>k</sup> Lord CLARENDON's Hist. of the Rebellion, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par M. VOLTAIRE.

The affairs
of Spain,
instead of mending,
grow
worse in Italy.

1658:

THE count de Fuenfaldagna had spent the whole winter in contriving to block up Valenza, with a full intention to besiege it as soon as the season would permit; but, before that time came, he met with a new mortification by the duke of Mantua's declaring himself neuter, in consequence of a negotiation that had been carried on under the mediation of the republic of Venice. The duke de Navailles served under the duke of Modena this year, the differences between the two princes having lessened very much the success of the last campaign. Before the count was in any condition to execute his project against Valenza, the two dukes marched directly towards him, while the Spanish forces under the command of the marquis de Villa took the fortrefs of Trin, in their march to join the army of the allies, which, arriving in sight of Milan, might have created some disturbance, if the count de Fuenfaldagna had not thrown himself into it with the best part of his forces, which kept the people quiet, and frustrated the enemy's designs. The duke of Modena, notwithstanding, besieged and took Mortara, the capital of the fertile district of Lomellino; and in all probability would have carried his success farther, if a distemper, which seized him at this siege, had not removed him out of this world <sup>m</sup>.

In the Low Countries
they go
still much worse, the English
acting as auxiliaries
to the French.

IN the Low Countries the French formed a very bold design for surprising Ostend; but it was managed with so little secrecy, that the Spaniards turned it to their advantage, inso-much that they took marshal d'Aumont, and all the troops that were to have executed it <sup>n</sup>. The viscount Turenne, notwithstanding this misfortune, resolved to undertake the siege of Dunkirk, or rather was forced upon it, the French court being constrained to it, in order to oblige Cromwell. It was a difficult, or rather a desperate enterprize, which could never have succeeded, if the Spaniards had taken the smallest precautions for its preservation; but they had conceived an opinion that cardinal Mazarine had fixed his heart on becoming master of Cambray, and therefore bent all their attention to the security of that place, notwithstanding his Britannic majesty, then in exile, gave them repeated notices that Dunkirk would be besieged. The marquis de Leyde, who was governor of that place, was at Brussels, soliciting for succours, when the French appeared before it, and not without difficulty found means to get into it without the succours for which he had applied. Don Juan of Austria, having made this capital mistake in delaying, made another more fatal by hastening to its relief; for, marching with all the troops he could assemble, but without artillery, to the Downs, he proposed to wait there for a favourable opportunity of forcing the enemy's lines. Monsieur Turenne, penetrating his design, took the shortest method to prevent it, by attacking him immediately: notwithstanding that Don Juan, the prince of Conde, the dukes of York and Gloucester, did all that was possible to encourage their troops, the army, sensible of the disadvantage under which they fought, were quickly and intirely defeated. This happened on the fourteenth, and Dunkirk was taken on the twenty-third, of June. Monsieur Turenne, pursuing his conquests, took Bergues Saint Vinox on the 2d of July, Furnes on the third, Dixmude on the 7th, Oudenarde on the 9th of September, Menin on the 17th, defeated the prince de Ligne on the 19th, and took Ipres on the 24th. In the mean time the marshal de Ferté took Gravelines; so that in the course of a war which lasted 28 years, the Spaniards had never experienced so many disgraces in any one campaign °.

<sup>1</sup> CESPIDES, Hist. Chronologique du dernier Siecle. <sup>m</sup> BATT NANI, Corps Diplomatique, tom. vi. P. ii. p. 225. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. REINCOURT, MONTGLAT, Histoire Chronologique du dernier Siecle. <sup>n</sup> Histoire du du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY, MONTGLAT, tom. iv. p. 171.

ON the side of Portugal both parties seemed determined Don Lewis to make the utmost efforts in their power. The queen dow- de Haro ager, a woman of great vigilance and spirit, had assembled <sup>takes the</sup> an army of eighteen thousand men, under the command of <sup>command</sup> Don Juan Mendez de Vasconcellos, an old officer of great re- <sup>on the side</sup> putation, and sent him with express orders to reduce <sup>of Portu-</sup> Badajoz. He amused himself, however, with attacking the <sup>gal, and</sup> fort of St. Christopher's, which, after all, he was not able to <sup>loses the</sup> take; and at last, rising from before it, passed the river, and Elvas. <sup>battle of</sup> besieged Badajoz. The duke de St. Germain, who commanded the Spanish troops, sent advice of this to Madrid, and withal informed the court, that the place was in so poor a condition, that it could not hold out long, and that it was utterly out of his power to relieve it. This raised such murmurs amongst the people, that Don Lewis de Haro, collecting all the horse and foot that could be drawn out of both Castiles, marched with fifteen thousand men to Merida, where the duke de St. Germain, having forced a passage through the enemy's line, joined him with one thousand horse, and then marched directly towards the place; but, upon their approach, Vasconcellos raised the siege, and retired. Don Lewis de Haro, flushed with this success, and finding himself at the head of near 20,000 men, resolved to conclude the campaign with reducing Elvas. The place was strong, and defended by Don Sancho Manuel, a stubborn man, who would have held out to extremity. The Spaniards, however, invested it, and pushed the siege with great vigour; but the queen dowager having reinforced her troops, and given the command to the count de Castagneda, he advanced immediately to its relief. In point of regular troops, his army was inferior to that of the Spaniards; but more numerous, comprehending the militia. The duke de St. Germain drew out his forces, and gave him battle; in which part of his cavalry being defeated, and he, advancing in person to cover his foot, received a shot in the head, and fell from his horse; which so discouraged his forces, that they presently broke, and were pursued with great fury by the Portuguese. The battle of Elvas was fought on the 23d of July: Don Lewis de Hara was spectator at a distance of this defeat, which cost the Spaniards about 2000 men, and returned immediately to Madrid. Don Rodrigo Moxico, who was next in command to the duke de St. Germain, fortified a post in the rear, and by that means rallied the troops, and made a good retreat; and the general, who was thought to be mortally wounded, thro' the skill and care of his surgeons, recovered.

• QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Madame MOTTEVILLE, MONTGLAT, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, REINCOURT, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Lord CLARENDON's History of the Rebellion, BURNET's History of his own Times.

The campaign in Catalonia, and the domestic affairs of the court of Spain.

THE dispositions of the court of Spain for carrying on the war against Portugal, was the true reason why the alterations on the side of Catalonia were slow and languishing. The marquis de St. Aunais, who commanded for the French in Roussillon, was sensible of this; and, being desirous of doing something that might make an eclat before the arrival of the duke de Mercœur, who was to replace the duke de Candale, he undertook the siege of Campredon, a place of some importance, between Gironne and Puicerda. The marquis de Mortara, who was unwilling to shew the weakness of Spain, by bringing his troops into the field, did not let flip this opportunity of displaying his military skill, which really deserved a command of more importance. He drew his forces together so secretly and so suddenly, that the French saw them before they had the least intelligence, and scarce saw before they felt them; in short, he forced their lines in three places, and not only obliged them to raise the siege with precipitation, but so effectually ruined their army, that the marquis de Mortara kept the field all the rest of the campaign, while the duke de Mercœur was obliged to be on the defensive. As to the domestic affairs of Spain, the king held a general assembly of the states of Castile and Leon, in which some good regulations were made, certain supplies granted, and all commerce with Portugal prohibited. Another event happened this year, which gave equal joy to the king and his subjects, and contributed not a little towards restoring the general peace of Christendom; this was the birth of the infant Don Ferdinand Thomas, on the 21st of December, so that the king had now the pleasure of seeing two princes capable of the succession, though neither of them enjoyed it. It was this that chiefly contributed to remove that formidable objection which hitherto had defeated all negotiations for a general peace, though nothing could be more necessary to the several powers engaged in war, and was to none so necessary as to the crown of Spain.

IN Italy, though the count de Fuensaldagna had not been very successful as a general, yet this was far from lessening his credit at the court of Spain, where he was considered as the ablest minister they had, in which he had no more than justice done him. He saw clearly the situation he was in; and though, as governor of the Milanese, he maintained to the utmost the forms and the magnificence introduced by his predecessors, and sustained the dignity of the crown with a steadiness censured only by those who were strangers to his motives; yet he represented things plainly at Madrid, and gave the ministers to understand, that affairs in Italy were irretrievable by any thing but a peace; that the duchy of Milan was on the very point of being lost; that its natural strength was utterly exhausted; that to draw supplies from the two Sicilies was to hazard them; that the emperor was tied by his capitulation from affording them any succours; that promises from Spain were useless, or rather mischievous; and that France was negotiating a league offensive and defensive with the republic of Venice, the conclusion of which would be a prologue to the conclusion of their empire in Italy. To the duchess dowager and regent of Savoy, he used a language somewhat different; he suggested, that if the French conquered the duchy of Milan, the territories of Savoy would be no more than a dependent province; those who were now their allies would become their masters; and those prerogatives, of which all sovereigns are jealous, would be immediately diminished, and gradually absorbed. His arguments had their weight every-where; king Philip was so much astonished at the danger, that he resolved to renew the negotiation which he had rejected; and the duchess of Savoy, though so nearly allied in blood to Lewis XIV. saw the count's reasoning in so strong a light, that she resolved to give no farther assistance to the conquest of Milan. She would perhaps have made greater alterations in her measures, but for the views she had of marrying the princess Margaret her daughter to that monarch, with which the cardinal had amused her long<sup>s</sup>, and which had contributed not a little to keep her in the French interest.

<sup>1</sup> Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. i. p. 244. MONTGLAT, tom. iv. p. 195.

<sup>2</sup> CESPICES, Hist. gen. d'Espagne.

Spain
sends a minister privately to the king
and cardinal, to renew the negotia-
tion.

THE remonstrances of the count Fuensaldagna engaged the duchess of Savoy to deal so explicitly with the French ministers, that the cardinal was constrained to bring the court to Lyons, that the king, and the queen his mother, might have an interview with the duchess of Savoy and the princess Margaret; the news of which made such an impression at Madrid, that Don Antonio de Pimentel was immediately sent to Lyons incognito, where, by applying himself to the cardinal, with strong assurances that his catholic majesty had no longer any repugnance to the marriage proposed between the most Christian king and the infanta, his proposition was accepted, and all thoughts of marriage with Savoy laid aside. A circumstance which was also favourable to Spain, as it changed the ruling maxims of that court, and convinced the duchess regent and her son, that, by an obstinate and blind attachment to France, they might help to aggrandize that crown, but without making any addition either to their own greatness or revenue; and that, by reducing the strength of the Spaniards, they lessened one of those supports, upon which, at some conjuncture or other, they should be forced to lean. The count de Fuensaldagna remained master of the negotiation on the behalf of Spain; for, though Pimentel received full powers from Madrid, yet he made a tour, in order to confer with the count de Fuenfaldagna, from whom he received his instructions. The great difficulty was as to the prince of Conde, whose interests were at last given up by the count, who perhaps remembered the differences that had been between them in the Low Countries; but, by way of equivalent, Portugal was given up by France. At length the preliminaries were settled at Paris, and, in consequence of them, and of the queen's interposition, France consented to a suspension of arms, and to the final adjusting of the treaty between the two ministers on the frontiers. These conferences were held in an island scarce heard of before, but which from this transaction became famous; it lay in the middle of the river Bidassoa, and was called the Isle of Pheasants. There was a kind of hall of audience erected, with a chair and a table on each side, but the opposite sides of the table met. Don Lewis de Haro passed over a bridge from the Spanish side, at the same time that the cardinal Mazarine advanced over a bridge on the other; they entered at opposite doors, and seated themselves in the dominions of their respective masters.

* MONTGLAT, Histoire de Mazarine, Histoire de la Paix des Pyrenees, Memoires de MOTTEVILLE, Memoires de Madame MONTPENSIER, CESPIERES, BATT NANI.

THESE conferences began on the 13th of August, and Cardinal ended on the 7th of November, and were in number twenty-four. Don Lewis, contrary to the preliminaries, brought the affair of the prince of Conde again upon the carpet, and pressed it extremely; but the cardinal remained firm, and even went so far as to say, that he perceived this negotiation would end like that three years before. Don Lewis protested it should not, and that he would adhere to the letter of the preliminaries. He added, his catholic majesty could not break his faith, and would therefore give the prince of Conde a district in sovereignty, or the government of the Low Countries. This forced the cardinal to disclose himself; for the prince of Conde, foreseeing what would happen, and desirous of returning home, had already submitted, and given up all his pretensions. The cardinal offered, therefore, that the equivalent intended for the prince should be given to the crown of France, and that the king should bestow his office of great master of his household on his son the duke of Enguien, and give the prince the government of Burgundy and Bresse, which was accepted. While the conferences lasted, marshal Gramont was sent to Madrid, to demand the infant; which he did in a very gallant manner, entering the place, not with the pomp and state of an ambassador, but in the new stile of royal courier, preceded by a postmaster, and a certain number of postillions, who were followed by a troop of sixty gentlemen, after whom came the ambassador

Cardinal
Mazarine
and Don Lewis de Haro, conclude the peace of the Pyrenees.

1659.

embassador all on the gallop, to express their master's impatience to have the infanta. It is not to be conceived what an effect this trivial circumstance had on the Spanish nation, and even on the king, who consented to the marriage with the best grace in the world. The treaty was at length signed, notwithstanding the disturbance given to Don Lewis by the duke of Lorrain, who was now set at liberty, and whose interests were very little considered, or the uneasiness given to the cardinal by the ambassadors of Portugal, and the perplexity they were jointly under from the presence of king Charles the second, and of the lord ambassador Lockhart, who, on the cardinal's asking him for whom he acted, answered pleasantly, that it was a point not yet settled in England, but that what he offered was on the part of those who should be uppermost. The renunciations also embarrassed them not a little; but at length the cardinal relaxed in that point, and suffered the Spaniards to do almost what they pleased, foreseeing that time and power would wear or break all these paper engagements. Thus ended this famous negotiation, which produced the treaty of the Pyrenees, equally blamed in France and in Spain, and, for that reason, it may be justly considered as the best and most equal that could be made at that juncture, and all circumstances considered.

The marriage confirmed, and the peace sworn to in the Island of Pheasants.
1660.

ONE of the principal motives that determined both Philip the fourth and his minister to the marriage and peace with France, was, the desire of turning the whole force of the Spanish monarchy upon Portugal: it was with this view that Don Juan of Austria was recalled in the spring of the preceding year. This event, though somewhat unexpected, was not at all displeasing to him, for he was become heartily weary of the Low Countries, where he saw nothing but misery, and heard nought but complaints. He concealed the order he had received, departed privately, and left the government to the marquis de Carracena. He returned thro' France, found the court wholly occupied with the great affair of the peace, yet fully determined on the conquest of Portugal, for which there was nothing wanting but the means. The king thought it no difficult matter to constrain

* QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire du Cardinal de Mazarine, M. de GUAR, tom. iv. p. 216. Histoire du Prince de Conde, Histoire de la Paix des Pyrenees, Memoires de MOTTVILLE, REINOLD, LORD CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion. PURNELL'S History of his own Times, Corps Diplomatique, tom. vi. part 2. p. 264.

the house of Braganza, now abandoned by France, to be content with their hereditary estates, and which he was desirous they should enjoy. Don Lewis de Haro desired to be revenged for the loss of the battle of Elvas: Don Juan desired they would have patience till the peace was so thoroughly settled, as that a certain number of regiments might be drawn out of Italy and the Low Countries, since without old troops he could not at all answer for the success of the war<sup>u</sup>. The losses sustained by the depredations committed at sea by the English, and the expences necessary for the conclusion of the infanta's marriage, made this delay very convenient; so that they were on both sides very inactive, and this campaign as little fertile of events as the last w. It had been agreed, that his catholic majesty and the most Christian king should have an interview in the Isle of Pheasants; previous to which their ministers met there, to adjust the ceremonial, and to terminate some disputes that had arisen upon certain articles of the peace; all this took up some time. At length, on the 3d of June, the marriage was celebrated at Fontarabia, Don Lewis de Haro representing the most Christian king. On the 4th the queen mother had an interview with his catholic majesty, whom she had not seen in forty-five years; he brought with him the infanta and Don Lewis de Haro; she was accompanied by her younger son and cardinal Mazarine. The queen and the infanta shewed great tenderness; the king preserved a fixed gravity, that differed little from coldness. His sister complained of it; and he contented himself with saying, that exterior marks of passion were not becoming kings. On the other hand, he was extremely civil to cardinal Mazarine, and, amongst other compliments, told him, that Europe stood indebted to him for peace. The king of France looked in towards the end of the interview, as if it was by stealth; upon which Philip could not help saying to his sister, with less gravity than he had hitherto shewn, that he was like to have a handsome son-in-law; and Lewis immediately retired. On Sunday the 6th of June the peace was sworn to with great solemnity by both kings. The nobility of France were then presented to his catholic majesty, who said to his sister, upon her naming the marshal Turenne, "He has made me pass many restless nights." The Spanish grandees, who were about fifteen in number, were in like manner presented to the most Christian king. The French were very richly dressed, the Spaniards were perfectly plain, except that they wore jewels to a prodigious value. Both the royal families had an interview at parting; at which Lewis, after throwing himself at his father's feet, to receive his blessing, embraced him, when he rose, with so much passion, that Philip, who had preserved his temper wonderfully at parting with his daughter, lost it, and burst into tears. The same sensibility appeared with respect to monsieur; and the two courts left each other in terms of the most perfect friendship and affection *.

<sup>u</sup> CESPIDES.      <sup>w</sup> STEVENS'S Supplement to Sousa's History of Portugal, CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion, CESPIDES.

Affairs of Spain remain perplexed even after the conclusion of this treaty.

1660.

THE prince of Conde, at his leaving the Low Countries to return into France, was treated with all imaginable respect. The marquis de Carracena accompanied him a league from Brussels, and all possible marks of esteem were shewn in the places through which he passed. The people, however, were not much displeased with his departure; for his troops, like those of the duke of Lorraine, had lived in a manner at free-quarter, and had oppressed that country which they pretended to protect; which, however, was excusable in some measure, by their being very indifferently paid, as all the troops were in the service of Spain. A very different conduct was observed with regard to his Britannic majesty, whom the marquis de Carracena would have arrested, if he had not withdrawn very critically into the dominions of the states general. This was remembered after his return into his own dominions, as well as the heartiness with which the court of Madrid had embraced the friendship of the parliament when they first took upon them the supreme authority. On this side, therefore, the Spaniards stood but indifferently; and they found likewise a visible coldness at the court of Vienna, where the emperor Leopold was not a little chagrined at the loss of the infant, for whose sake he had made very large offers to king Philip and his ministers, which, without doubt, would have been accepted, if they had not conceived of his ability in the same light as they did of his intention †.

Don Juan moderately successful in the war

It was the principal object of the Spanish ministry to preserve the peace, which was so necessary to their affairs, which had been obtained with so much trouble, and which had cost them so dear. This induced them to look upon the death of * Memoires de Madame de Motteville. Histoire du Cardinal MAZARIN, Memoires de Madame MONTPEÑIER, MONTGLAT. Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques. QUINCY Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. † CLARENDON'S History of the Rebellion. Histoire du Prince de CONDE.

cardinal Mazarine, which happened in the spring, as a great <sup>against the</sup> misfortune, the catholic king having a great confidence in <sup>crown of</sup> his pacific disposition. He left a picture of Titian's, of pro- <sup>Portugal.</sup> digious value, to Don Lewis de Haro, and bestowed a golden <sup>1661.</sup> able-clock on the count de Fuenfaldagna, which served to confirm this opinion, at a time when it could be only the subject of regret*. The army of Don Juan was in reality very considerable: he had 13,000 foot and 6000 horse, Spanish, German, and Italian troops, commanded by the best officers that were in the Spanish service. He began with the siege of Aronches, a place important by its situation, and capable of being made much more so, if it had been properly fortified. The Portuguese army advanced as far as Elvas, though they were not strong enough to relieve it. The governor spared them the trouble, by yielding it sooner to the Spaniards than he needed to have done. Don Juan, having caused the place to be thoroughly repaired, and some further works to be added, put his troops into quarters of refreshment. The Portuguese, either to acquire or to maintain the character of bravery, attacked the Spanish cavalry, tho' they were not so numerous or so good; but they were repulsed with considerable loss, which cost the life of Don Juan de Pacheco, who commanded the Spanish horse, and was very dear to the prince. When the heats were over, Don Juan took the field again, and besieged Alconchel, but not with any great vigour, that the Portuguese army might have time, if they were so inclined, to come to its relief; but as the governor was not in Don Juan's secret, he spoiled his scheme, by surrendering the place before it was expected. Don Juan caused it to be well fortified, put a Spanish garrison into it, and then retiring to Badajoz, suffered his army to take winter-quarters*. He perceived plainly the enemy would not fight, and was unwilling his troops should moulder away in sieges.

Don Lewis de Haro was extremely displeased with this <sup>This no</sup> campaign; he had flattered himself with the conquest of <sup>way an-</sup> Portugal, and there had not been so much as a battle. On <sup>suffered the</sup> the other hand, Don Juan acquainted the king that he stood <sup>hopes or</sup> in need of recruits and supplies; that kingdoms were not so <sup>the necessi-</sup> easily conquered; that the enemy acted with great caution; <sup>ties of the</sup> and that, if any accident happened to this army, he did not <sup>Spanish</sup> see how his majesty could form such another. He had cer- <sup>ministers:</sup> tainly reason on his side, and yet the ministers were not altogether in the wrong. France, notwithstanding the peace, had suffered count Schomberg, who was an excellent officer, to go to Portugal with six hundred volunteers. It was by his lights the Portuguese generals directed their conduct: he advised them to excursions and skirmishes, but to avoid battles, that they might gradually form their troops, while those of Don Juan were diminished. The court of England had embraced the interests of Portugal, negotiated a peace with Holland, assisted them with money, tho' it is said that money came from France, and Charles had entered into a treaty for marrying the princess Catharine, sister to the young king of Portugal. The short remedy for these mischiefs was to conquer that country, and dethrone the king. They were certainly right in their measures, but they mistook the means. They published to all Europe the design of this conquest, which did not at all contribute towards effecting it.

* Hist. du Cardinal MAZARINE. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, CHOISY, MONTGLAT, CESPICES. * STEVENS'S Supplement.

Behave in all respects in a manner
very unsuitable to the circumstances of the monarchy.

THEY sent the baron de Batteville to London, to bully a prince who was already out of humour. He went so far as to doth is in writing; and, in a memorial, proposed to Charles the choice of several princesses, in favour of whom he promised, on the part of Spain, mighty advantages; concluding with menaces if his advice was not taken; for which he was forbid the court <sup>b</sup>. He then, according to the common practice of Spanish ministers, fell to intriguing and plotting with the malecontents. This conduct of his not being discouraged, in time he rashly engaged in a quarrel with the French minister, the count d'Estrades, for precedency, and gained some advantage over him by force, having distributed his money liberally amongst the mob <sup>c</sup>. This was one of the most unlucky things that could have befallen Spain; for the archbishop of Ambrun demanded, in the name of his master, immediate satisfaction, if the court of Spain was inclined to avoid a war. The count de Fuensaldagna was then at Paris, and did all he could to qualify matters. He was going into the Low Countries with the title of governor, but died on the road. A little before his death, he wrote to Don Lewis de Haro, that peace was necessary to Spain, and consequently those measures that were necessary to maintain peace. Phi- himself was of the same mind; upon which the count de Fuentes was sent ambassador extraordinary into France, to give up the precedence in the most solemn manner; to perpetuate the memory of which the French caused his audience to be engraved upon a medal. But, before this happened, Don Lewis de Haro was in his grave, and the court of Madrid plunged in the deepest melancholy for the death of the only surviving prince of Spain; which gloom was, however, in some measure dissipated, by the birth of Carlos, on the 5th of December <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Corps Diplomatique, tom. vi. part ii. p. 366. MONTGLAT, Hist. du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY, CHOISY, STEVENS's Supplement.

<sup>c</sup> See the whole Relation, as drawn up by the celebrated JOHN EVELYN, Esq; at the command of Charles II. of the manner of the encounter between the French and Spanish ambassadors, at the landing of the Swedish ambassador, in PHILLIPS's Continuation of BAKER's Chronicle.

THE war with Portugal was carried on this year with Campaign greater vigour than ever. None of the ministers about his in Portu- catholic majesty had the same credit with Don Lewis, and gal very Don Juan's interest with his father was so good that he ob-<sup>favour-</sup> tained from him all that he asked. He took the field in the <sup>able, but</sup> month of May, and intended to have opened the campaign <sup>still not</sup> with the siege of Estremoz; but the count de Castagneda, now <sup>satisfac-</sup> stiled the marquis of Marialva, encamped under its cannon <sup>tory to the</sup> with his army, which consisted of 12,000 men; and there- <sup>ministers.</sup> fore, at the request of the officers who commanded under him, he declined the siege of that place, and prosecuted his march, which threw Portugal into the utmost consterna- 1662. tion. Many have believed, that, if he had pursued his march to Lisbon, he must have carried it, the inhabitants being filled with a panic, and they had no relief to expect; but Don Juan was afraid to trust his army in so large a place, with another at its back. He took Villabuim, which was surrendered by the French governor by consent; and, in his way to Jurumenha, he came before Borba, a poor old place, once fortified, but then in ruins. Don Rodrigo de Cunha had in it a small garrison, with which he prevailed upon the inhabitants to join, and made the best defence he could; however, it was carried by storm, the garrison made prisoners of war, the town burnt, the people plundered, and, to crown all, Don Rodriga, and two of his captains, were hanged in the market-place. He next besieged Jurumenha, a strong place, well fortified, with a garrison of 3000 men, commanded by Don Manuel Lobato Pinto, who defended it long enough for the Portuguese army to come to its relief; but they found the camp of Don Juan so well fortified, that they durst not attempt any thing, and consequently the place surrendered on the best terms that could be obtained. Don

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE, MONTGLAT, MARTINIERE. Hist. Generale d'Espagne. Hist. Chronologique du dernier Siecle.

Juan came next before Villaviciosa; but there again found the Portuguese encamped under the walls; upon which he turned, and took two large towns, full of military stores and provisions, without any resistance. Crato, which belonged to the knights of Malta, and in a worse condition was taken sword in hand, and the governor was shot. The reduction of a few inconsiderable places more finished the campaign, which terrified the Portuguese extremely, the count Schomberg had brought their army into good order and more especially their cavalry*. The French king quarrelled with the pope, and carried his pretensions high, his catholic majesty concurred with him, which occasioned many speculations. Dunkirk also was this year sold to the French for an inconsiderable sum of money, which had not been for the ill conduct of Batteville, would probably have been restored to the Spanish Netherlands.

Don Juan,
by dint of
his superior
forces, enters that
kingdom,
and takes
the city of Ebora.

1663.

In all appearance the two crowns were perfectly reconciled and had nothing so much at heart as giving each other the world, marks of it. The most christian king refused, when requested by his Britannic majesty, to contribute any assistance towards the relief of the Portuguese catholic majesty, on the first application of the bill. Ambrun, promised a free passage through his dominions in Italy to the French army that was to act against the Spaniards. Both courts were alike sincere; for the care of supporting Portugal was committed to marshal Turenne by the measures were taken to shut all the passages into Italy on the other. Don Juan was not so early in the field as in former campaign; but he had a better army, and was at the head of 21,000 men directly towards Ebora, the young king of Portugal, Don Alonso, at this time a boy, and not at all promising in point of parts, had his mother, to whom his father and himself owed the crowns, from the regency; so that there was scarce any of civil government left. He had appointed Don Manuel, count de Villafior, to command the army; by good fortune, count Schomberg was left to assist him. The first thing the count did was to send a new governor to ra, without withdrawing the old one. As soon as the new governor was invested, they quarrelled, and, in five days, the old governor gave it up. The news excited an insurrection.

* STEVENS'S Continuation of Soufa's History of France, tom. vi. part ii. p. 432. BUSSET, Louis le Grand. MONTGLAT, REINCOURT, CESPION, &c. NET'S Hist. of his own Times.

Lisbon, and struck a panic into the army. Count Schomberg recovered them, by shewing the advantages that might be taken of Don Juan in his retreat. These advantages were taken gradually; so that the soldiers comprehended them better than the generals, who envied him, because he was a stranger. Don Juan beheld their motions and encampments with amazement, and was so generous as to commend a general, whom the Portuguese abused.

At length they attacked him in a mountainous passage, where his infantry marched along the tops of steep hills, where it was judged impracticable to reach them. The English regiments in the army of Portugal crept up those hills upon their hands and knees; the French officers followed them, and at length the Portuguese did the same. The Spanish troops did not behave so well as they were wont to do, notwithstanding that Don Juan dismounted, and exposed himself extremely. His army was routed, with the loss of between three and four thousand killed, and as many taken prisoners. On the side of the Portuguese there fell about a thousand. This battle fixed the crown upon the head of the house of Braganza; and the count de Villafior recovered Ebora after a week's siege. Don Juan, having conducted the remains of his army to Badajoz, went in person to Madrid, to justify his conduct; but he returned again to the army, and made the necessary dispositions for protecting the frontiers &c. The king Don Philip, finding his health declining, and repeated fits of the gravel wearing away his strength, concluded a treaty with the emperor Leopold, for the support and maintenance of the house of Austria; in consequence of which he brought a great body of German troops into the duchy of Milan and kingdom of Naples, and consented likewise to his marrying his youngest daughter, whom he had declared capable of inheriting the Low Countries, and all the rest of his dominions. This contract for the marriage was not consummated till after his demise, and was presented by the marquis de Fuentes to be subscribed by Lewis XIV.; but, as might have been easily foreseen, that satisfaction was refused. The catholic king had the farther displeasure of seeing the imperial troops recalled, almost as soon as they arrived, the emperor being attacked by the Turks <sup>h</sup>. By these measures the ministers shewed they had not changed their sentiments in regard to France, at a time their circumstances were not changed.

Is beat by the Portuguese at the battle of Ebora, by which that city is speedily recovered.

<sup>g</sup> STEVENS'S Continuation of Soufa's History of Portugal. Hist. du Vicomte de Turenne, par M. DE RAMSAY, DESMARETZ.
<sup>h</sup> QUINCY Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. Hist. Generale d'Espagne.

The ministers disgusted by the want of success in two campaigns, send for the marquis de Carracena.

1664.

AFTER all the pains Don Juan was able to take about the ministers, and notwithstanding his interest with the king his father, the affairs of Spain were in so bad a situation, that it was impossible for him to procure the necessary supplies. The Portuguese, therefore, under the command of the marquis Marialva, were not only first in the field, but alone in it likewise; for, after reinforcing the garrisons, Don Juan had only a great corps of horse left, with about two or three thousand foot. Encouraged by these circumstances, the Portuguese besieged Valentia de Alcantara, a place strong by situation, large, rich, and well fortified. Don Juan sent a body of horse to disturb the besiegers, and directed the governor to defend himself to the last extremity. He obeyed these instructions till he found himself in want of powder, and then thought fit to capitulate; which perhaps he would not have done so soon, but for the bad example which Don Juan had given in hanging and shooting governors, who, in his opinion, defended places too long. The duke of Offuna, who was a very brave man, commanded an independent body of seven thousand men, and was very desirous of distinguishing himself: this induced him to make an inroad into Portugal, and to besiege Castel Rodrigo, which was a place of strength. Don Pedro Magellans, who commanded on that side the troops of Portugal, forced him first to raise the siege, and then to fight, where, tho' he behaved himself very gallantly, his troops were soundly beaten, and himself forced to retire, leaving two thousand men upon the spot. The Spanish ministers, attributing all these misfortunes to Don Juan, sent count Marsin to take the command of the army; upon which Don Juan returned to Madrid. They also engaged the king to confer the government of the Low Countries on Don Francisco de Mauro, count of Castel Rodrigo, that the marquis of Carracena might be at liberty to return into Spain, and command against Portugal. The emperor, having demanded succours of France against the Turks, obtained them; but upon this express condition, that his catholic majesty should send the like number of troops out of Italy, which was done to prevent their being brought into Spain to serve against the Portuguese; and, in revenge, the Spanish ministers engaged the emperor to make a very indifferent peace with the Turks, after the victory at St. Goddard. They had not the same ascendancy in the United Provinces,

† STEVENS'S Continuation of Sousa's Hist. of Portugal.

the states shewing a visible partiality to the French, through the influence of the grand pensionary John de Witt *.

THE count de Marfin, tho' a stranger, had the confidence He ar- of the ministry, who, tho' they did not furnish Don Juan rives, and with troops during the campaign, yet enabled this French flatters the officer to form gradually a very fine army in the winter, and ministry with all things necessary. It was in truth the last army they with the had to raise, and comprehended all the old regiments of Spa- niards, Germans, and Italians, that were not yet worn out, hopes of and amounted in the whole to 15,000 foot and 6000 horse. conquering On the arrival of Don Joseph de Benavides, marquis of Carracena, late in the preceding year, he was pressed to go im- Portugal mediately to the army; but he desired that the duke of Avey- ro, who, tho' a grandee of Portugal, partly from pride, but in appearance out of regard to the oath he had taken to Phi- lip, had left an estate of 40,000 crowns a year, and lived in Castile, should assemble a fleet at Seville, in order to block up Lisbon by sea, when he should arrive before it with the army; for this was the language the marquis had talked in Flanders, and continued to talk at Madrid, upon a supposition that the Portuguese were such as he left them, and without any distinct knowledge of their country. At length he went to the army; upon which count Marfin retired, because he would not serve under him. The first thing the marquis did, after reviewing his own troops, was to obtain the best informations possible as to the country of Portugal, the situation of mountains and rivers in his passage to Lisbon, and the character of the Portuguese troops, and the officers who commanded them. These opened to him new scenes, and obliged him to entertain new notions. He found the country was not to be so easily traversed as he imagined; and he was amazed to hear that the enemy's cavalry was numerous and full of spirit; that their foot, by the management of foreign officers, were become hardy, patient, and wonderfully exact in obedience; but what troubled him most was, that, in the factions at the court of Lisbon, count Schomberg had so effectually supported the councils of the marquis de Marialva, that the latter had an intire confidence in him. 1665.

HOWEVER, Carracena took the field early; but, instead is totally of marching to Lisbon, invested Villaviciosa, which was de- defeated in fended by Brito, an old Portuguese officer, very skilful in the the plain art of war, and very stubborn. There were three strong of Montes posts without the town, which he caused to be occupied by Claros, * MONTOLAT, BUSSI, QUINCY Hist. Milit. de Louis XIV. Vie de TULLY, edit. Cologne, 1694.

where the last army
of Spain
is ruined.

the best part of his garrison : the marquis de Carracena, desirous of carrying them at once, caused them to be attacked by all the grenadiers in his army, who were every-where repulsed with great loss; but the governor immediately withdrew his troops, and abandoned them all, that he might be in a better condition to defend the place. When the siege had continued long enough to weaken the assailants, the Portuguese army appeared; upon which the marquis raised the siege, and marched to give the enemy battle. It was fought in the plain of Montes Claros with the greatest obstinacy on both sides, and lasted eight hours : in the end the Portuguese gained a complete victory, killed four thousand on the spot, took Don Diego Corrier, general of the Spanish horse, many officers of note, and more than four thousand men, prisoners. When Philip IV. received the news of this defeat, he had only strength to say, It is the will of God; then dropped the letter, and fell himself in a swoon<sup>1</sup>. The ministers lost their spirits, the populace upbraided them openly with betraying Don Juan of Austria, and sacrificing the glory of Castile to their private interests. The remains of the Spanish army being thrown into garrisons, the Portuguese very wisely declined making sieges, and put their troops into quarters of refreshment; for their victory had been pretty dearly bought, they having three thousand men killed, and, amongst them, a large proportion of their best officers<sup>m</sup>; but when the campaign was finished in a manner at land, it began again as it were at sea; for the duke of Aveyro, having at length completed his squadron at Cadiz, cruised along the coasts of Portugal, and committed some depredations, which were severely revenged by count Schomberg's irruption into Andalusia, which was executed with so much vigour, and at the same time with so great conduct, that the Portuguese returned with an immense booty, before the Spaniards recovered from their first surprise.

Death of Don Philip IV.
and a suc-
cinct character of that monarch, and

THE situation of affairs in Spain was at this time extremely critical; the ministers had not much the confidence of their master, and were in absolute disgrace with the people, who, in those days, spoke their minds as freely with respect to public affairs, as any nation in Europe. Don Juan of Austria was at Cónsuegra in discontent; and tho' the marquis de Carracena kept up his spirits, and persuaded them that if they would recruit and reinforce his army, he would still do his administration, all he had promised, it had no manner of effect; on the contrary, the court in general was inclined to a peace, and yet they were slow in making any attempts towards it. Out of this lethargy they were awaked by a new misfortune; for, on the 12th of September, the king was seized with a dysentery so violently, that, in two hours, he was in great danger of death. His physicians administered what relief they could; so that the next day he was in a condition to make his will, and, tho' weak, appeared somewhat better, but in a few days relapsed, and, having received the sacraments of the church, breathed his last, in his palace at Madrid, on the 17th of the same month, in the sixty-first year of his age, after a reign of forty-four years <sup>a</sup>. He was in himself a prince of more than moderate abilities, and, if he had received a better education, and had not come to the crown so young, he would certainly have made a much greater figure. But the great artifice of Olivares in soothing his propensity to pleasure, in magnifying the fatigues of business, and making him believe he underwent a martyrdom to relieve him from the weight of the administration, kept him so long in a state of indolence, that, even when he thought it necessary, he could not bring himself to a proper degree of application. He loved magnificence, had a very polite taste, spoke with great vivacity upon many occasions, and, though his reign was far from being fortunate, had the grandeur of the Spanish monarchy always at heart. By his testament, tho' that was not in the least necessary, he called to the succession his son Don Carlos; and, in case he died without issue, left the crown to the infanta Donna Margaret, contracted to the emperor Leopold; in case she died without issue, the succession was to pass to her husband, and his heirs male; upon the failure of them, to the duke of Savoy; and, upon the extinction of that house, it was to descend to his eldest daughter, provided she was a widow, and to the children of her second marriage, if she had any such. He settled the regency in the queen his widow, and appointed the president of the council of Castile (the first civil officer in this monarchy), the vice-chancellor of Aragon (so stiled, though there is never any chancellor), the inquisitor-general, the archbishop of Toledo, and the marquis of Aytona (of the house of Moncada in Catalonia), her council. He was interred in that magnificent dormitory of the Spanish kings, called the Pantheon, which he had rebuilt and finished in the year 1655, being persuaded that what Philip II. had done was not equal in magnificence to the rest of that royal structure; less lamented by his subjects then, than at the distance of some years.

<sup>1</sup> STEVENS's Continuation of Sousa's History of Portugal. Histoire Generale d'Espagne. Memoires of Madame de MORTVILLE, QUINCY Histoire Milit. de Louis XIV. <sup>m</sup> STEVENS, ubi supra.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques. STEVENS'S Continuation of Sousa's History of Portugal. Histoire Chronologique du dernier Siecle. MONTGLAT, QUINCY Hist. Milit. de Louis XIV. Hist. Gen. d'Espagne. La siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. Memoires de Madame de MOTTEVILLE. CESPICES. BURNET'S Hist. of his own Times.

*Accession
of Don Carlos II.
and character of his mother
the queen
regent.*

THE young king, Charles the second, was inaugurated, or, as the Spanish phrase is, had the ensigns displayed for him, on the 7th of October, being at that time not quite four years of age. He was of a weak and tender constitution, but of parts so pregnant and promising, that when he was proclaimed in the Low Countries, as he was with great solemnity, the people expressed, by every method they could devise, their expectations that he would resemble his ancestor of the same name, the glorious emperor Charles the fifth. It was a misfortune to him that the queen his mother, tho' the daughter of an emperor, the widow of a king, and the sister of the reigning emperor, had not the talents requisite to the right management of power; it was still a greater misfortune that she was jealous and fond of it to the last degree; but it was the greatest of all that she was possessed of it, through a course of years more than sufficient to ruin the authority of the crown, to ruin and exhaust the subject, and to disable this unfortunate prince himself from repairing these mischiefs when he was sincerely inclined to it. This description is severe; but the fundamental law of history is to speak truth. She was intirely devoted to the interests of the court of Vienna, and governed in all things by the counsels that she received from thence, except in points that regarded her private inclinations; for in these she listened to no counsel at all. The first was a fault, but, her descent and circumstances considered, very excusable; the latter was a greater fault, and, which was worse, would not admit of any excuse or alleviation. She persisted obstinately in both against the remonstrances of the ablest of her council, as well as all the lights of reason and experience. This character of the queen is necessary, as it will explain all that follows.

Her unat-tractable conduct at

AT her first entrance on the government, she was desirous of bringing her confessor, father Nitard, a man of low birth, of a very limited capacity, a stranger, unacquainted with

• Les Delices d'Espagne & du Portugal, par Don JUAN ALVAREZ DE COLMENAR. CESPIDES. P Histoire Generale d'Espagne.

public

public affairs, and not at all beloved, into the council of regency, which she effected by engaging the cardinal of Arragon to resign to him the post of inquisitor-general; an employment of great weight, and hitherto highly respected in Spain. By her influence over the late king, she had prevailed upon him, in his last moments, to exclude his natural son Don Juan from having any share in the administration, tho' he was a prince of confessed abilities, both as a statesman and a soldier, had given great proofs of them, was intirely beloved by the people, and was in every respect worthy of her confidence, but more especially from his great disinterestedness, and his tender affection to the person of the king. In this measure she was at first abetted by most of the ministry, and by many of the grandees, from principles of prejudice, envy, and private interest; but by degrees she lost this support, for they saw so plainly that he was the only person capable of restoring the credit, and sustaining the weight, of government, that they concurred with the people in desiring that he might be recalled and employed; to which she was so averse, from the apprehension that he would dismiss her ecclesiastical favourite from the council, or at least circumscribe his power, that she formed a design of removing that prince out of the kingdom, under the pretence of sending him to govern the Low Countries, which she might have effected, if her management had not been as bad as her views. The weakness and unsteadiness of her conduct, which would have been highly prejudicial at any time, proved particularly destructive at this juncture, when affairs were in such a state as demanded the greatest circumspection and fortitude to prevent all things from running into confusion; and very possibly this might have been done, if she had demanded the assistance of Don Juan cordially and in due time<sup>1</sup>.

AT the demise of king Philip IV. Spain still remained engaged in the war with Portugal, and Charles II. scarce began to reign, before a war with France became inevitable. In order to render the progress and issue of these great affairs perfectly intelligible, it will be necessary to treat them separately, tho' succinctly. In regard to Portugal, the marquis del Carpio, who was prisoner there, had instructions and powers sent him to treat of a peace, under the mediation of Charles II. king of Great Britain; for the Spaniards had at length found out that nothing could prove more prejudicial to their affairs than a quarrel, nothing contribute so much her entering upon the regency, and her obstinacy

therein:
1666.

Compelled to make peace with Portugal,
and to acknowledge
the rights
of the house of Bra-
ganza.
1667.

<sup>1</sup> Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. Memoires de Madame MOTTEVILLE.

to their prosperity as a good understanding, with England; notwithstanding which, they were so dilatory in their negotiation, and so unwilling to acknowledge Don Alonso for king of Portugal, that they suffered the season to escape them, in which the treaty might have been concluded most to their advantage, from a persuasion that it was always in their power, and that they might conclude it how and when they pleased. But the French, who had a great interest in the continuance of the war, made suddenly an unexpected treaty with Portugal, and granted to that crown a considerable subsidy'. This was very near answering their purpose, and taking the Portuguese intirely out of the hands of the English; but the Spaniards, seeing this in time, laid aside all their scruples, recurred to the old mediation, and signed a peace, by which both kings were to restore all places taken during the war, except Couta and Barbary, which was to remain to Spain. All confiscations were also to be void, all prisoners to be set at liberty on both sides without ransom, free commerce between both nations to be restored; and if, in process of time, any doubts or disputes should arise, they were to be amicably discussed, without having recourse to arms. Thus, after twenty-eight years war, the right of the house of Braganza was acknowledged, and the two crowns reconciled, by a fair and final treaty of peace, under the guaranty of the crown of Great Britain, subscribed at Lisbon on the 13th of February, by the duke de Cardaval, the marquis of Niza, admiral of the Indies, the marquis de Gouvea, the marquis of Marialva, the conde de Miranda, and Pedro Vieyra de Silva, secretary of state on the part of Portugal, Don Gaspar de Haro Guzman, marquis del Carpio, on the part of his catholic majesty and his mother, and by Edward Montagu, earl of Sandwich, on the part of the king of Great Britain. It was solemnly ratified at Madrid on the 23d of the same month*.

War with France,
and vast sacrifices
made by

THE queen mother of France died five months after her brother the king of Spain; and it was given out by the French king and his ministers, that out of decency, and in regard to the melancholy situation of both the royal families, they had not insisted on the right of the French queen to a great part of the Low Countries, in virtue of what was stiled the crown the Jus Devolutionis, or custom of Brabant, by which the of Spain children of the first marriage, whether male or female, are in the heirs to each other, in preference to the children of a second treaty of marriage. In consequence of this title, the French embaf- Aix-la-Chapelle. fador presented his master's letter to the queen mother, demanding immediate possession of what devolved to the infanta Maria Theresa, queen of France, as the heiress of her brother Don Balthasar<sup>1</sup>. The queen of Spain and her council were very far from seeing this set right so easily as his most Christian majesty seemed to expect, and would by no means listen to the answer returned, that, if there was any such right, it had been clearly renounced at the time of the infanta's marriage. The most Christian king, who was well aware of this, and had been from the time of his Catholic majesty's death providing every thing for the execution of his project, rushed immediately with three great armies into the field, and laid the foundation of his future greatness, in taking a multitude of places in no state of defence, and, as himself admitted, in a time of full peace. The affairs of Spain in the Low Countries were indeed in a very low condition, and not under the best administration; for tho' the marquis of Castel Rodrigo could not but be sensible of the great weakness of the provinces still obedient to the Spanish crown, and the necessity they must be under, whenever attacked, of recurring to the protection of some friendly neighbour, yet he was far from treating either of the maritime powers with kindness or respect. On the contrary, under the name of the bishop of Munster, he had projected taking Williamstadt from the Dutch, which, though the states discovered, they were willing to pass over, upon his disavowing it. Indeed they had suffered themselves to be amused a second time by France, by a treaty of partition, as if the injustice of tearing these provinces from Spain could be alleviated or atoned for by their having a part of them. It was the resentment of the former, and their flattering themselves too much from the latter kind of usage, that suspended their resolutions, and rendered them tame, tho' not quiet, spectators of the mischiefs to which their neighbours were exposed. France gained in one campaign more than in the course of the former war of many years; and, not content with this, in the succeeding winter, partly thro' force, and partly through treachery, made herself mistress of the country of Burgundy, or, as it is usually stiled, the Franche Comté, in which expedition the prince of Conde, for whom Spain had done all that she was able, was the instrument Lewis XIV. thought fit to employ<sup>u</sup>. This awakened the jealousy of the states, who, with very unusual vigour and presence of mind, concluded with Great Britain and Sweden the famous triple alliance<sup>w</sup>, the best and boldest political measure taken in the last age, and which saved the Spanish Low Countries from being swallowed up. For the French King, perceiving that, if he carried on the war, it would be no longer against a weak and defenceless power, thought fit to stop short, and very wisely, though unwillingly, concluded the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle on the 2d of May<sup>x</sup>, by which he retained Charleroi, Binch, Ath, Douai, le Fort de l'Escharpe, Lisle, Oudenarde, Armentieres, Courtray, Bergues, Furnes, with their bailiwicks, and other conquests, but thought fit to restore Franche Comté. The Spaniards, in this treaty, took care to avoid acknowledging the queen of France's right to the places they were obliged to yield, and caused it to be inserted in the treaty, that, for the sake of restoring peace to Europe, and at the intercession of the pope, they had abandoned those places to the French king.

* Corps Diplomatique Universel du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. Part i. p. 17.      * BURNET's History of his own Times, STEVENS's Continuation of Sousa's History of Portugal, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Corps Diplomatique Universel du Droit des Gens, tom. vi. P. i. p. 70.

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de Madame DE MOTTEVILLE, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. MONTGLAT, REINCOURT.

Don Juan obliges father Nittard to quit Spain, and retire to Rome, where he is made a cardinal.

WHILE these black storms thundered on the Spanish monarchy without, it was far from enjoying repose or tranquillity at home. It was the precarious state of the Low Countries, and the necessity of providing for their future safety, that the queen caused to be represented in the strongest manner to Don Juan of Austria, to prevail on him to go thither. The more easily to persuade him, he had the clearest assurances given him, that he should reside there with an authority as full as he could desire, carry a large sum of money with him, and receive large and regular supplies, to enable him the better to perform the great things that were expected from him. When Don Juan had accepted these proposals, and was actually at Corunna, with an intention to embark for Flanders, the queen caused Don Joseph de Malladas, a gentleman much in his favour, to be arrested, and put to death by a warrant under her own hand. She is reported to have done this upon a supposition that Don Juan was actually embarked; but, being obliged by accidents to remain some days at Barcelona, he no sooner received the news of Don Joseph's death, than he quitted that city, and retired to one of his own seats. This gave the queen, and her minister father Nitard, great anxiety, more especially when they understood that he was surrounded there by persons of great distinction; nor was it long before she received such applications from him, as made it clearly evident, that she had more cause to apprehend danger from him than he from her. However, some of the grandees, desirous of composing these disputes amicably, represented to her majesty, in the softest manner possible, that the great power of the inquisitor-general gave universal distaste to the nation; that the peace which they at present enjoyed was very precarious; that a multitude of abuses had crept into the administration; and that, in justice to the state, out of regard for her son, and from a due respect to her own glory, she ought to take the most speedy and effectual method for redressing these mischiefs, and restoring that authority to her administration, the want of which was become but too apparent. The queen was so ill advised, that she treated these remonstrances as insolent and unbecoming, and threatened to make examples of such as should take liberties of this kind for the future. The prince, notwithstanding this, directed his secretary Patinho to deliver a memorial in much stronger terms, in which he very plainly intimated, that a reformation was necessary, and that it ought to begin with the removal of the ecclesiastic, who was looked upon as the principal author of those grievances under which the nation suffered. It was easy for her to have discerned that the prince would not have ventured upon this step, if he had not looked upon himself as secure from the effects of her anger; but believing that her power would be speedily unsettled, if she did not treat such an application as this with severity, she caused Patinho to be instantly put under arrest. Don Juan, upon this, advanced from the place of his retirement to within a small distance of Madrid, and sent from thence a short message to the queen, that if, by the 26th of February, the inquisitor-general did not leave the capital, he would come thither, and oblige him to quit it, in a manner that would not be agreeable to him. The prince had at that time about him no more than three hundred horse; of which the queen being perfectly well informed, she issued her orders for putting the city into a state of defence ; and perhaps would have proceeded farther, if she had not found these orders disobeyed ; which alarmed father Nitard to such a degree, that he quitted Madrid on the 25th<sup>2</sup>. The queen took care to have him conducted as safely as possible out of the dominions of Spain, and sent him to Rome, where she honoured him with the title of embassador, and procured for him a hat from the pope ; of which honour he gave notice to Don Juan by a very civil and submissive letter, in hopes it might have procured him the means of returning to Spain ; but as that prince did not think fit to write him any answer, he very prudently laid aside a project which it appeared impracticable for him to execute. The queen, having consented to such regulations as were required from her, declared Don Juan lieutenant-general of the kingdom of Arragon, and, in consequence of his accepting that honour, removed him from court<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Histoire du Prince de Conde, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire generale d'Espagne, MONTOLAT.

<sup>w</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. P. i. p. 68.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par M. LE CLERC, Lettres, Memoires, & Negotiations, de Mons. le Comte d'ESTRADES.

† Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

The conde deMonte. rey makes a bold and generous attempt in favour of the Dutch.

AFTER the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, the Spanish ministers, by a new strain of policy, attempted to provide for the security of the Low Countries, by declaring to the maritime powers their inability to make such a provision. As strange a measure as this was, it had its effect, and the states paid to the king of Sweden that subsidy which had been stipulated on the part of Spain ; and in all probability this method might have been practised longer with success, if the French intrigues had not prevailed upon the court of England to depart from the principles of the triple alliance<sup>b</sup>. Upon Don Juan's refusing to go into Flanders, the constable of Castile was sent thither ; and the marquis de Castel Rodrigo, though refused a passport, went incognito thro' France into Spain. The constable of Castile held the government but one year ; for the marquis de Aytona dying, the queen recalled him, in order to replate that lord in the council, and sent into the Low Countries Don Juan Dominic de Haro y Guzman, conde de Monterey, second son to the famous Don

<sup>2</sup> Relation de la Sortie d'Espagne du P. Everard Nitard, Jesuite Confesseur de la Reine, en Espagnol & en Francois, par le P. BOURBOIS, Relation des Differens arrivés en Espagne entre D. Juan d'Autriche & le Cardinal Nitard, depuis la Mort de Philippe IV.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne & Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

<sup>b</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. BURNET'S History of his own Times, Memoires & Negotiations de M. le Comte d'ESTRADES.

Lewis de Haro, and younger brother to the marquis del Carpio, who applied himself with great vigilance and vigour to the discharge of his office. He it was who, when the Dutch were in the lowest and most distressed condition possible, had the honour to contrive, and the courage to execute, though not the happiness to achieve, the reduction of Charleroy, which, at his instance, the prince of Orange besieged in the absence of the governor; and would infallibly have taken it, if, through the negligence of some of his officers, Mr. Montalt, the governor, had not entered it with succours. If this enterprize had succeeded (and the count de Monterey gave it all the assistance in his power) the French must have immediately quitted all their conquests in Holland; but the prince being obliged to raise the siege, the crime of projecting it fell upon the head of the marquis de Monterey, of whom the most Christian king complained loudly at Madrid, where the queen disavowed his conduct, which was all the satisfaction that could be obtained.<sup>c</sup> 1672.

THE court of Madrid was very far from disapproving in reality what had been done by the count of Monterey, tho' they were not a little chagrined at the disappointment he had met with, and which some ascribe to count Marsin, who commanded such of their forces as were engaged in the siege. The governor of the Low Countries, therefore, continued his correspondence with the prince of Orange, and converted even his miscarriage into a signal service to the states; for, having taken care thoroughly to explain the consequences of his scheme if it had taken effect, and thereby shewn that there was a probability of delivering the Dutch, as well as a necessity of attempting it, he may be justly considered as the author of that spirit which was afterwards shewn by their neighbours, in assisting and saving that republic, or rather of the instrument of which Providence made use in that critical conjuncture for the Protestant religion, and the independency of Europe. If Lewis XIV. had taken the advice of Monsieur Pomponne, the Spaniards had paid dearly for this act of generosity, since he proposed accepting of the terms offered by the states in the height of their misfortune, in order to turn the whole force of the French monarchy on the Spanish provinces. But the French king depended on a negotiation that had been set on foot to amuse

The courts of Vienna and Madrid reject the offers of Lewis XIV. and close with the states. 1673.

<sup>c</sup> Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Histoire generale d'Espagne, QUINCY; Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

the court of Vienna, which likewise failed ; and thereupon both the emperor and Spain renewed their alliances with the states, and declared in their favour against France<sup>d</sup>. The firmness and rectitude of this measure may seem incompatible with the account we have given of the weak administration of the queen mother ; but the reader must remember, that in foreign affairs the queen took the advice of the council of regency, and of the imperial minister, who, from their regard to the interests of the house of Austria, could not advise her better or otherwise than they did, which fully accounts for this transaction and its consequences.

Messina is Sicily revolts,
which greatly em-barrasses
the Spanish councils.

THE next year was more fertile in events. The old duke of Lorrain, though he had no great obligations to the court of Madrid, acquainted both the imperial and Spanish ministers with his suspicions that the French would attack the Franche Comté. But they either neglected his intelligence, or what he proposed was out of their power to execute, consistent with their other schemes ; so that this fine country was detached from the Spanish monarchy, and added to that of France, by a short but vigorous campaign<sup>e</sup>. In Flanders the Spanish troops, under the command of the count de Monterey and prince Vaudemont (son to the duke of Lorrain) acted in conjunction with the Dutch, who were headed by the prince of Orange, and had their full share in the battle of Senef, fought on the 11th of August, in which a great part of their infantry was ruined<sup>f</sup>. The duke de St. Germain commanded in Catalonia, and had the year before concerted measures for the revolt of Roussillon, which, tho' it was prevented by a discovery, yet he carried on the operations of the war with success, gained a considerable advantage over the army of count Schumberg, and would probably have done more, but for the revolt of Messina. That city, which is one of the capitals of Sicily, had for its governor Don Lewis del Hoyo, who fancied that he could not do a greater service to the crown of Spain, than to subvert that form of rule which had subsisted there for many ages. He failed in his attempt ; the prince de Ligne, viceroy of Sicily, constrained him to quit the city ; and the people, who intended only to maintain their just rights, readily submitted. They discovered afterwards, by an intercepted letter, that

1674.

<sup>d</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part i. p. 236. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>e</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. NEUVILLE, Histoire de Hollande, BASNAGE.

<sup>f</sup> Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC.

the prince had promised the court of Madrid to crush them when they least expected it, and restore the old governor in triumph. This threw things again into confusion; and tho' the old governor was removed, and Don Diego de Soria, marquis de Crispano, sent in his room, they did not think themselves safe, more especially as he caused some of their senators to be arrested; but, having expelled the Spanish garrison, demanded the protection of France. It was this that obliged the court of Madrid to order the duke de St. Germain to return into Catalonia, and to embark part of his forces for Sicily, where, notwithstanding they had a superior fleet, under the command of Don Bertrand de Guevara, the French had the good fortune to relieve Messina, which encouraged the people to persist in their revolt<sup>s</sup>.

At the opening of the year the count de Monterey was recalled from the government of the Low Countries; and the French duke of Villahermosa, who had commanded under him with the title of general of horse, was appointed to succeed him, and directed to receive his instructions. There never was a governor more esteemed or beloved than the count, who reformed many abuses in the administration, took great pains to promote the manufactures of the provinces, and contrived and executed the famous sluices near Ostend, for the benefit of navigation. He was impenetrable to the arts, and, which was more, to the offers, of France, who, notwithstanding, paid so much respect to his merit, that, in the midst of a war, they granted him a passport for his passage by land into Spain<sup>b</sup>. The campaign on the side of Flanders was not very remarkable. In Roussillon the Spaniards were able to do but little; and though count Schomberg commanded the French, they did not do much. In Messina the people again were in danger of perishing through want, but were relieved at the opening of the year by a small French squadron commanded by the marquis de Valavoir, who, notwithstanding, would not land any troops till they had put the principal posts into his hands, and acknowledged themselves subject to the French king. Men will do any thing to eat; and it was this that engaged them to submit to these terms, which they had very soon reason to repent, the insolence of their new masters making them forget what they had suffered under their old ones. In a month's time they were blocked up by the Spanish fleet, and in as great distress as ever; but, on the 9th terfere,

and send a strong squadron to the relief
of Messina: 1675.

<sup>s</sup> BASNAGE, REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques.

<sup>b</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

of February, another French Squadron appeared, under the command of the duke de Vivonne and the sieur du Quesne, which entered the port, and relieved the place, in spite of all that the Spanish admiral could do to prevent it<sup>i</sup>. The duke assumed the title of viceroy, and plundered the people he should have protected. He was brother to the French king's mistress, Madame de Montespan; and, presuming upon her favour, made a bad use of his good fortune, studied every method to enrich himself, and, by his negligence, gave the Spaniards time to secure the places he should have attacked, which, contrary to their custom, they did not lose.

His catholic majesty declared of age, and gives a proof of his great spirit.

ON the 9th of November Charles the second was declared major, to the great satisfaction of himself and his subjects. His preceptor, the bishop of Malaga; was his brother by the father's side, though Philip the fourth would never own him, out of respect to his mother, who was sister to the marquis de Mortara, and whom he married while she was with child to the marquis of Quintana. She told her husband the truth, who died of vexation in two months. When her son was of age, she confided the secret to him, who immediately became an ecclesiastic, and the king his father afterwards bestowed upon him that rich bishoprick. He did what lay in his power to give the young monarch just notions suitable to his dignity; whereas the queen laboured all that was possible to prevent his having a turn to any thing but amusements and diversions. It was owing in all probability to the instructions he received from the prelate, that when, a few days after he became of age, the queen presented him an act, declaring, that, on account of his tender years and want of experience he left the government to the queen his mother, and the council who had assisted her during his minority, he refused to sign it, adding, "that he hoped God, who had made him a king, would enable him to become the father of his people." It has been reported, and believed, the great change that soon after appeared in his temper was owing to a certain method of preparing his chocolate; at least the caution given him by the marchioness de los Velez, who had been his governess in his infancy, fortified this opinion, she bidding him "beware of one, who, from her fondness of being a queen, might possibly forget

<sup>i</sup> Corps Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part i. p. 316. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC.

“ that she was a mother <sup>k</sup>.” The manifest imbecillity of this prince, in his last years particularly, proved highly detrimental to Spain.

THERE had been in the winter some negotiations relative to a peace, in consequence of which it was agreed, that French a congress should be held at Nimeguen; but, notwithstanding this, both sides made great preparations for the campaign. It is indeed true, the prince of Orange complained that the duke of Villahermosa performed his promises but very indifferently; which was certainly fact, but it was owing to his inability. The ministers at Madrid contracted with bankers to remit him a large sum every month; upon the faith of these contracts he made his promises; but as the ministers never advanced any thing to the bankers, they looked upon their contracts as dissolved, and the duke bore all the blame with the allies. After all, the campaign was not very glorious or very unfortunate; the French king commanded in person, and avoided fighting the prince of Orange at Valenciennes, which the allies considered as a kind of victory. On the side of Roussillon, the Spaniards acted on the defensive under the duke de St. Germain; the French had a good army under the marshal de Navailles; but he did nothing in effect; and though the Spaniards were too weak to keep the field, yet their miquelets harrassed the French army till they abandoned some small places they had taken, and went into winter quarters<sup>1</sup>. The sending a French viceroy into Sicily so alarmed the court of Madrid, that they demanded from the states a fleet for the protection of that island; which was accordingly sent under the command of admiral de Ruyter, one of the greatest seamen ever bred in that nation, or in any other. He cruised in the streights of Messina in the beginning of the year, to prevent the French from throwing in any succours.

ON the 7th of January du Quesne appeared with the French Admiral fleet. Admiral de Ruyter had, besides his own, the whole naval force of Spain in those seas, which consisted in a single ship of war and a small squadron of galleys: the latter, on account of the foul weather, were obliged to put into port. Du Quesne attacked with great spirit, for, like de Ruyter, he had made his way to the first honours by mere dint of merit, and meant to keep them by pursuing the same track. The Dutch admiral said in his letter, that he had never been in a battle so obstinately fought. It lasted till night with equal advantage; for though de Ruyter sunk a French man of war, yet one of his own met with the same misfortune as they were towing her away; but the French carried their point, and victualled Messina<sup>m</sup>. When the six months, for which the Dutch fleet had been sent into the Mediterranean, were expired, de Ruyter returned to Leghorn; but, finding his masters orders to give the Spaniards all the assistance in his power, he sailed again for their service to the coasts of Sicily, and, to facilitate their operations by land, appeared before Messina. The duke de Vivonne, whose fleet was now augmented to fifty sail; by the advice of du Quesne, resolved to quit the port, and to give him battle. It began about three in the afternoon, on the 22d of April, and was fought with great courage and spirit, notwithstanding admiral de Ruyter, in half an hour after it began, was wounded in both legs. This engagement did not end till between seven and eight, and then both sides claimed the victory as before, tho' the advantage seemed rather on the side of the enemy. The Dutch and Spanish fleet went to Syracuse for refreshments, where, on the 29th of the same month, de Ruyter breathed his last, having been honoured with the order of St. Michael from the French king, and the title of duke by his catholic majesty, which he did not live to enjoy<sup>n</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> Memoires Historiques, Politiques, Critiques, & Literaires, par AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAIE, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Histoire generale d'Espagne. <sup>1</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Actes & Memoires de la Paix de Nimegue, Edit. de la Haye, 1697, Histoire des Negociations de la Paix de Nimegue, la Haye, 1697.

The Spanish and Dutch fleets beaten, sunk, and burnt, by the French.

THE Dutch vice admiral Van Haan took the command, and sailed from Syracuse to Palermo, where, while he was busy in repairing his ships, and recruiting their respective crews, the duke de Vivonne arrived, with twenty-eight men of war, nine fireships, and twenty-five galleys, before the port; upon which the combined fleets of Spain and Holland formed in a half-moon at the entrance of the port; in which situation, after reconnoitring them for three or four days, the French attacked them on the 2d of June. The combined fleet fought with great spirit, till the Spanish vice admiral cut out of the line, and ran ashore, to avoid being burnt

<sup>m</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. BASNAGE, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques. " Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Vita Michaelis Ruyter, par GERARD BRAND, Amstelod. 1684. fo. Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC, NEUVILLE, Histoire de Hollande, BASNAGE, Annales des Provinces Unies, Histoire Metallique des Pays Bas, par GERARD VAN LOON, tom. iii. p. 175, 176.

by a fireship. The French improved this advantage, and, having the wind in their favour, sent their fireships down upon the Spanish line, by which it was broke. The admiral cleared himself of two, but was burnt by the third, together with three men of war and two gallies that came to his assistance; the rest, to avoid the same fate, ran ashore. The enemy fell next upon the Dutch, and set one of their largest men of war on fire; the flames communicated themselves to two others; upon which, after destroying their own fireships, the rest retired into the port, and took the best measures they could for their own security. In this unfortunate action the Spanish admiral Iberra and the Dutch admiral Cornelius Van Haan were both killed, with a great number of officers, soldiers, and seamen. To increase this misfortune, one of the ships that blew up fell directly into the streets of Palermo, where, by the great beams and iron-work, many people were killed°. This victory raised the spirits of the Messinese, and threw the whole island of Sicily into a general consternation, which might have made way for a general conquest, if it had been improved. 1676.

WE must now turn our eyes upon the interior state of Queen mo- affairs in the Spanish monarchy, where the queen, soon after ther of father Nitard was torn from her councils, produced a new Spain en- favourite on the stage, to whom she was still more benefi- tertain a- cent, and who of consequence was quickly loaded with a new fa- still greater proportion of public hatred. It has been infi- vourite, and raises him to great posts. nuated, that, if the conde de Monterey had not been wanting to himself, he might have been both minister and favourite; but he having declined some advances that were made him, Don Hernando de Valenzuela made a more rapid progress than any favourite that had been yet seen, since, in the space of a few years, he rose, from being a page to a nobleman, not only to high offices and great appointments, but to the rank of a grandee of Spain of the first class. He was beautiful, brave, enterprising, generous, but without the knowledge or experience requisite to a man whom his own good fortune, and the inclinations of the queen his mistress, brought to manage the affairs of a great kingdom. He took, however, some precautions for the preservation of his power, which were certainly very well imagined. He adhered with the utmost fidelity to the queen who raised him. He laboured to gain the good-will of the people, by keeping 1677.

° BASNAGE, Annales des Provinces Unies, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, QUINCY, Hist. Milit. de Louis XIV. NEUVILLE, Histoire de Hollande.

Madrid constantly supplied with provisions at very reasonable prices : he took care to divert them with spectacles of different kinds, of which there are no people in Europe more fond ; and he was at pains to have the king in a manner besieged by his creatures. He did not certainly take any measures for restoring the reputation or the affairs of the Spanish monarchy ; he did not attempt to reduce their finances into a right method ; he did not apply himself to study the interests of the monarchy with an assiduity requisite to enable him to make a right use almost of his absolute power. But these were things in reality out of his way and out of his reach ; what fell within the circle of his capacity he did ; and he would not have hindered those whose duty it was, and who were well enough qualified to have done it, from doing more. His great foible was his vanity, which led him to make a display of what his interest and his duty might have taught him to conceal ; this gave a colour to popular clamour, and an air of patriotism to the cabals formed against him by the grandees, though, after all, he suffered as much for other people's faults as his own P.

Don Juan of Austria comes to the assistance of the king, and banishes the queen dowager.

Don Juan, who governed Aragon with an authority much superior to that of its ancient kings, derived that authority from himself, that is, from his own conduct. He added to the Spanish regularity, in every thing he did, that spirit which at first gave it reverence. Modest and simple in his dress and in his court, he made the great object of his administration the good of the people. He found the constitution of Aragon well suited to this, and, by keeping to the letter of that constitution, he taught the people, by his veneration for the laws, to obey them without murmuring. He was inflexible in the execution of justice ; but, where he found any opportunity, he never failed to manifest his compassion. This raised his character, and countenanced the grandees at Madrid in their endeavours to place him at the head of the government. He had brought the affairs of Aragon into order, and the want of it was visible everywhere else. The duke of Alba and the count of Montcrey were the principal persons amongst the nobility who interested themselves in this respect ; the former was much esteemed, and had a great influence ; the latter had a generous heart, joined to as cool a head as any in Spain. After milder methods had been tried to no purpose, an association was formed, and signed by the grandees, who concurred in sentiment with the duke of Alba, at his house ; but the great point of all was, to engage the king to add the sanction of his name, that, for doing the loyalest action in the world, they might not be either reputed or treated as rebels. Don Carlos came readily into the project as soon as it was proposed to him; his parts were not so lively as they had been, yet he still remembered he was a king, and desired to be considered in that light by his subjects. He took a resolution, therefore, of leaving his palace at Madrid, and going to the Pardo; and though he was forced to walk part of the way on foot, to which he had not been used, he performed it without complaining. There he met with Don Juan, who gave him a very succinct and true account of the state of his dominions, the distress of his subjects, and the methods by which they might be relieved. In consequence of his advice, and with the concurrence of the council, the queen mother was removed to Toledo, which she considered as a kind of banishment. Don Hernando Valenzuela, who had taken shelter in the convent of Escorial, was at length found there, concealed in a nich made for that purpose, in a cell of one of the monks, transferred to a prison, degraded from all his honours, and sent to the Philippines. He behaved with great spirit under his misfortunes; and, after remaining years, sometimes in the East sometimes in the West Indies, was at length suffered to return to Spain. This great revolution happened in the spring, when Don Juan received, from the unanimous voice of the nobility and people, the title of protector and preserver of his country<sup>1</sup>. They changed their sentiments soon after, and would have called him the betrayer of it, if they durst.

THE negotiations were carried on all this time at Nime-Campaign guen, where it appeared to be evidently the design of the in Flan-French to let all the losses fall upon Spain. It must be indeed owned, that the Dutch had hitherto borne in a great measure the charge of the war, which, though grievous to them, was however but just, since the Spaniards came into it for their preservation. Besides, it had been carried on chiefly for their benefit, so that at this time they had recovered the best part of their country, and most of their fortresses except Maestricht. In point, therefore, of justice and decency, they were content to make this campaign, that their allies might have some opportunity of repairing their losses, or at least of making better terms; of which there appeared such a probability, that they rejected the cessation of arms proposed by Lewis XIV. from a belief that Charles the fifth, who had succeeded his uncle of the same name in Lorrain, and was at the head of the emperor's armies, would be able to enter into his own dominions, and, by the assistance of the allies, into France itself. They had the misfortune, however, to be disappointed in their expectations. The French king very unexpectedly took the field on the last of February, opened the trenches against Valenciennes on the 10th of March, and carried it very unexpectedly by storm on the 17th, not without great suspicions of treachery. The town and citadel of Cambray were reduced in less than a fortnight; at the same time that the duke of Orleans lay before St. Omer's, the prince of Orange hazarded a battle at Cassel for its relief, in which he was beaten by that duke, assisted by marshal Luxemburgh, on the 11th of April<sup>s</sup>. After this, at the pressing instances of the Spaniards, he once more formed the siege of Charleroi, which he raised on the 13th of August, upon the approach of marshal Luxemburgh, and declined fighting the French army, upon which the duke of Villahermosa warmly insisted. When the campaign seemed to be at an end, the French besieged and took St. Guilain, in the beginning of December<sup>s</sup>. In Catalonia Don Juan of Austria furnished the count de Monterey with a superior army, by ordering all the troops to join him that were intended to be transported to Sicily, judging very rightly, that the licence with which the French troops lived in that island would inspire its inhabitants with courage enough to drive them out. The marshal duke de Navailles commanded for the French, and, their historians say, did wonders. It is certain that he acted upon the offensive at the beginning of the campaign; that, upon the approach of the count de Monterey, he retired towards Roussillon, through a rough and mountainous country, through which the Spaniards followed him, and fought him on the 4th of July, when both sides claimed the victory; but that it belonged rather to the Spaniards may be presumed from hence, that the French, according to their own accounts, decamped at midnight, and retired into their own territories. It must be owned, that the campaign did not answer the expectations of Don Juan, who looked coldly upon the count de Monterey, tho' some say this was rather owing to his having too great an interest in the affections of the young king<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

<sup>r</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC, BASNAGE, Annales des Provinces Unies, Lettres Historiques de Monf. PELISSON, Memoires du Marquis DE FEUQUIERES, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

THE proceedings at Nimeguen went on very slowly, which was not a little owing to the Spaniards, who, presuming on that honour and generosity which they had shewn in coming into the war, insisted upon as good terms as if they had been victorious throughout the course of it, to which the French would not agree. The Dutch gave the Spaniards good words and good advice, but endeavoured to soften them as far as was in their power. The prince of Orange, indeed, who was for carrying on the war, spoke another kind of language, still less acceptable to the Spaniards, for he inveighed against their want of punctuality, their dilatoriness and imbecillity, which, after all, was owing to the perplexed state of their affairs, and to their indigence, which they were at once too proud to confess, and too lazy to amend. The French king took advantage of these favourable circumstances for accomplishing his designs. In the very beginning of March he invested and reduced, or rather surprised, Ghent, and soon after invested Ypres, at the siege of which he assisted in person. The Spanish garrison was commanded by the marquis of Conflans, who made a gallant defence, and did not render the place till after twenty-five days open trenches<sup>2</sup>. The French next blocked up Mons, which had its effect, as we shall see in its proper place. The marshal duke de Navailles being considerably reinforced in Roussillon, after menacing Roses in Catalonia, suddenly invested and besieged Puicerda, which was very gallantly defended. The count de Monterey assembled his forces, and took such measures as he thought most expedient for its relief; but, whether he wanted strength, or was in reality inferior in military skill to the French marshal, who was indeed considered as one of the best officers of that age, so it fell out, that his design miscarried, and Puicerda was lost. This ruined the count with Don Juan of Austria, who caused him to be exiled<sup>3</sup>, though he had been one of the principal persons who had opened a passage to his return from Arragon; and though, for this reason, Don Juan has been accused of ingratitude, yet it will hereafter

The next intirely of the same complexion both there and in Catalonia.

1678.

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de NAVAILLES, BASNAGE, Annales des Provinces Unies, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

<sup>2</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

<sup>3</sup> Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, & auct. sup. citat.

appear,

appear, that his treatment of this nobleman could not proceed from so base a principle.

French
fleet and forces abandon Messina,
and the court takes no care of them in the peace.

WHAT Don Juan had foreseen, with respect to the island of Sicily, came exactly to pass. The duke de Vivonne suffered his soldiers to live in a manner at discretion, and was at the same time very rapacious; this created heart-burnings and complaints, which, instead of procuring redress, produced confiscations. The Sicilians in general came to have an utter abhorrence for the French; and the English being on the point of joining with the Dutch, in sending a strong maritime force to the assistance of the Spaniards, Lewis XIV. took a quick resolution of withdrawing his forces from that island, and sent Monsieur de la Feuillade, with a strong squadron in the spring, to put that design in execution. The duke de Vivonne, who had previous intelligence of this step, managed every thing with such address and circumspection, as made it plainly appear, that the innumerable errors of his government were not at all owing to want of capacity. He gave out that he had a secret expedition of the utmost importance in view, which would require the whole force under his command; and carried his dissimulation so far, that public prayers were addressed to heaven for the success of what was never intended. Thus, after insulting and abusing both God and man, the French troops and the treasures they had plundered were embarked on board Monsieur de la Feuillade's squadron on the 8th of April, and then, and not till then, the Messinese were informed, that they were to be deserted. In the consternation they were under at this unexpected news, the only expedient of which they could think, was, to quit their country, and retire to France, which between four and five hundred of them did; but the bulk of the inhabitants were abandoned, not only by the French fleet and army, but by the ministers of France also, in the negotiations at Nimeguen, to the resentment of the court of Madrid; and not a few of them paid with their lives for having been weak enough to place any confidence in a power that acted only from motives of self-interest and ambition*. It might, however, have been more to the advantage of Spain, if clemency had taken place of resentment.

After much negotiation,

THE great object of the French negotiations was, to detach the republic of the United Provinces from her allies, in which they at length succeeded, notwithstanding all the op-

* Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques, QUINCY, BAS-NAGE, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

position that could be given to this measure by the prince and with of Orange. The states, indeed, had two things to plead, no small which were, the excessive expences of the war; and that difficulty, Maestricht, which was the only place France held out of the treaty all her conquests, was to be restored. The French, by one at Nime- of their great refinements in policy, were very near losing guen is this peace, when there was nothing left towards its conclusion concluded. but the bare form of signing. They had promised the Dutch to restore certain places to Spain, without taking any notice of the time when this restitution was to be made; and, being pressed upon this head, the plenipotentiaries acknowledged it was the king's intention not to proceed to these restitutions till the like were made to Sweden, which, in this war, had suffered as much for being the ally of France, as Spain for her attachment to the states. But the Dutch acted with great steadiness in this particular, fixing a day certain, by which if the French did not depart from this pretension, they would look upon their engagements as void. When the day came, the French acquiesced, and the treaty was signed on the 10th of August. The prince of Orange, notwithstanding, attacked the French army before Mons four days after; which, however, did not prevent both parties from adhering to the treaty. This put the Spaniards under the necessity of accepting the terms prescribed to them; and the treaty was accordingly subscribed between France and Spain, by the plenipotentiaries from the respective crowns, on the 17th of September following, at Nimeguen. The places restored to Spain by this peace were Charleroy, Binsch, Ath, Oudenard, Courtray and its dependencies, the town and duchy of Limbourg, Gand, the fort of Rodenhuis, the country of Waes, Lewe, and St. Guilain, their fortifications being first rased. Puicerda in Catalonia was also restored. France retained the Franche Comté intire, the towns of Valenciennes, Bouchain, Conde, Cambray and its dependencies, Aire, St. Omer, Ypres and its chatellenie, Warwick, Warrenton, Poperinghen, Bailleul, Cassel, Bavai, Maubeuge, Charlemont or Dinant. The public tranquillity was far from being restored by the conclusion of this peace; for the French had so many new pretensions, and the Spanish ministers flattered themselves with such hopes of being assisted by both the maritime powers, that it was not till towards the end of the year that the ratification of Spain arrived, and was exchanged;

† Memoires & Negociations de la Paix de Nimegue, Histoire des Negociations de la Paix de Nimegue, Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. Part. i. p. 365.

changed; by which the people were freed from their apprehensions of seeing a new war kindled out of the ashes of the old one.

Don Juan THE revolution that happened in their domestic government had filled the Spanish nation with hopes that they should see all their grievances redressed, and the reputation of the crown speedily revived. This, without question, was what Don Juan had in view; but, considering with himself the instability of his own situation, and the odious colours that might be thrown on the manner in which he assumed the administration, in case of any new change, he resolved to prevent this, on establishing, by a judicial inquiry, the certainty of those facts which had been alleged as the causes for the disgrace of the queen mother, which, though at this time it was allowed just and requisite, yet it was afterwards treated as a needless act of severity; and which served only to bring to light things that had better have been concealed. The queen, during her administration, had not only negotiated, but concluded, a treaty of marriage for the king her son, with the archduchess Maria Antonietta, daughter to the emperor Leopold, though a perfect infant, and had even gone so far as to notify this to the states general; notwithstanding which, that contract was laid aside, and in compliance, as it is said, with the king's own inclinations, who was exceedingly charmed with the picture of the duke of Orleans's daughter. Don Juan sent the marquis de los Balbazez into France, to demand that princess, who had his audience for that purpose of his most Christian majesty on the 10th of May, and every thing was settled and concluded by the 2d of July. As Maria Louisa of Orleans stood equally related to Lewis XIV. and Charles II. of England, this match was highly applauded, and Don Juan received great compliments thereupon; and yet (such strange things fall out in courts!) this marriage was improved by the enemies of Don Juan into the cause of his disgrace, and that broke his heart before the arrival of the young queen, who stood indebted to him for that pompous, though, in its consequences, no very pleasing title<sup>2</sup>. The circumstances of this new revolution, which disappointed the measures that had been concerted for a gradual reformation of whatever was amiss in the government, shall be represented as clearly and as succinctly as it is possible.

<sup>2</sup> Memoires de Madame MONTPENSIER, Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part i. p. 417. Histoire des Negociations de la Paix de Nimegue, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

THE young king seemed to be so much satisfied with The Spa- his marriage, that such as were attached to the queen mother, nish cour- such as had grounds to apprehend the result of Don Juan's tiers, by inquiries, such as thought themselves neglected since the com- their arts, mencement of his administration, such as had felt the effects turn this of his displeasure, and such as had a faculty of intriguing, very mea- concurred in the insinuations, that though he certainly pro- sure to posed, yet he secretly laboured to prevent, this marriage. his pre- They gave out, that, even in proposing it, he had chiefly in judice. view the crossing the queen's designs of marrying the king into her own family; that he had privately negotiated at Lisbon for the young princess, who was like to be the heir of that crown; and that the minister he had sent into France did not proceed with a vivacity suitable to the king's desires. These suggestions had made some impression upon the king's mind, when Don Juan, unfortunately for himself, but surely from a noble and generous motive, represented to the council, that, since the king was to marry a niece, and not a daughter, of France, this occasion might be taken to engage that crown to make some concessions in favour of Spain, or at least to put a stop to those proceedings in the Low Coun- tries, by which the subjects of that crown felt almost all the miseries of war in the midst of peace. The council, to make their court to the king, rejected this proposition, tho' very prudent in itself; and which might have been productive of very good effects. The king was pleased with this, and shewed a visible coldness towards Don Juan; upon which signal, many, who had the greatest obligations to him, abandoned his party, and, amongst the rest, the king's confessor, who owed that post intirely to Don Juan's favour. In the midst of these intrigues, he was seized with an ague, and, while he was indisposed, things proceeded so far, that he saw his disgrace inevitable. He had conferred upon the count de Monterey, of his own accord, one of the best employments in the new queen's household; a certain proof, that, with respect to this nobleman, he was not implacable; but this did not hinder his being chagrined when he found the count recalled from exile without his consent.

THIS, and a multitude of other accidents of the same Don Juan kind (not to give into the suspicion of something of a worse falls sick, sort), threw him into a mortal disease, which emaciated him and, after to such a degree, that his physicians, who could never tell languishing what to make of his disease, despaired of his recovery. The some time, king's tenderness revived when it was too late; he visited dies of a broken heart.

him, wept at the sight of his condition, complaining, that, now he had most need of his advice, he was about to lose him. Don Juan did not appear much affected with these marks of royal compassion. He took that opportunity to enter into a full detail of the state of public affairs, to let the king see in how perplexed, as well as in how declining, a condition they stood; to point out to him the true sources from which all these mischiefs flowed, and the sole remedies that could prove effectual. He pressed him to make a proper choice of a council, and to apply himself, by the help of their advice, to administer the concerns of his kingdom. He exhorted him to remember always his duty to God and his people, and to beware of listening to flatterers and favourites; and, with many wishes for his long life, prosperity, and issue by his queen, he took leave of him for ever. On the 17th of September he expired, and, by his will, bequeathed all his estate, which was but very small, to the king; his jewels, which were more considerable, to be equally divided between the two queens<sup>a</sup>. Calumny, loud even in his last moments, became dumb at his decease. The vulgar were convinced of his disinterestedness; and the whole nation confessed, that, in him, the abilities and virtues of the house of Austria made their last efforts. He left behind him a natural daughter, who was a nun. He was scarce interred before the king went to Toledo, to bring back the queen mother to triumph over his ashes, and to persecute with unrelenting hatred all who had manifested their zeal for their country, by adhering to a prince who had nothing else at heart; which she did, till the terror of this vindictive temper again deprived her of power<sup>b</sup>.

His death
has an extreme bad
effect on public affairs,
which fall
into confusion.

1680.

THE king went to meet his new queen, and consummated his marriage, by a strange indecorum, in one of the poorest villages in Old Castile, from whence he conducted her to Burgos, and, in the month of February, made a pompous entry into Madrid. The vast expences that attended this marriage added to those evils with which Spain was already oppressed. There was for a long time no administration at all; but such business as could not be delayed, the king dispatched with the secretary of state, a young man, without either parts or experience, who, by assiduity and cunning, had supplanted his master, and, by the practice of the same

<sup>a</sup> Histoire gen. d'Espagne, Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Memoires historiques, politiques, critiques, & literaires, par AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAIE.
<sup>b</sup> Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

noble arts, kept the king from fixing for a long time upon any minister; nor was he determined in his choice at last, but by the constable of Castile's generously declaring in favour of his competitor for that high post, the duke de Medina Caeli, who was a nobleman of a gentle disposition, and very much beloved. The young queen found herself under great restraint, and, from a very different education, found the Spanish customs very uneasy and troublesome. The queen mother lost her power by degrees, in endeavouring to extend it. The prince de Harcourt, who accompanied the queen from France, and the marquis de Villars, who was ambassador from that crown, were disagreeable to Charles. They looked narrowly into every thing; they entered into conferences and connections with the grandees; and the latter more especially took a pleasure in delivering his master's haughty messages in a manner that rendered them still more distasteful. The accounts they gave from time to time of the distracted state of things at Madrid, where one untoward accident was continually following another, induced Lewis XIV. to form various pretensions, as if he had delighted in trespassing upon the catholic king's patience, or rather insulting his circumstances. He obliged him to lay aside the title of duke of Burgundy, to part with many villages upon the frontiers of Roussillon, as well as in the Low Countries, to give orders for his ships striking the flag to those of France, and to give him distinguished satisfactions for disputes between their subjects, in which sometimes right was on his side, though they were almost always unworthy of notice. Such is the situation of a king, whose splendor appears only in his titles; and such the repeated reasons by which Charles was taught, that the monarch, who cannot make war, can as little enjoy peace; of which he was at length so convinced, that he told his queen, he should be glad of a war to be rid of M. de Villars &c.

In making choice of the duke of Medina-Caeli for prime minister, the king satisfied the court and the nation, as well as himself; but it was for a very small time, after which the clamour revived, and became even louder than ever. This did not proceed from any thing the duke had done, but from his doing nothing. He was indeed qualified to be the king's favourite, but not his minister; his capacity was good, his intention was better; but there were so many evils to be redressed, so many things to be provided for, and such an intire deficiency of funds, that, like one amazed, not knowing what road to take, he stood quite still. At length he ventured upon the worst measure he could take, which was, regulating the copper coin, which he reduced from its nominal to its real value, and thereby confounded every thing, since there were no less than fifteen millions of this coin in Spain. By this error two mischiefs were brought to meet that before were scarce seen together, for money was scarce, and yet provisions were dear. To correct this, the copper money was called in, and the king promised to pay its value in six months; which, as it was known he could not perform, it served only to make things worse. In the mean time foreigners made an advantage of this in many different ways, more especially when great families came at last to coin or sell their plate. The misery of the court was so great, that many of the king's menial servants left the palace for want of subsistence; and the king, with the advice of his council, was not able to find money for the annual journey to Aranjuez, though that is but seven leagues from Madrid<sup>d</sup>. The navy sunk to nothing, the funds destined for its support being diverted by those whose duty it was to apply them. The soldiers deserted on the frontiers, for want of pay; and at last the governors quitted their fortresses, to come and represent at Madrid in person what they had often represented by letters to little or no purpose.

* QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Mercure Hollandois, sous l'an. 1680. Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

Become despicable in the sight of allies, and of all foreign nations.

1681.

As to the settled revenue of the crown, it was anticipated for several years, and, which was much worse, the collection remained in the officers of the crown, who did not bring in above one tenth of what they levied upon the people into the king's coffers, or, what stood in their place, the pockets of the assentists, so that the anticipation of all was made upon a very small part. Another singularity was, that many, if not most, of these assentists, were Jews, who, for the sake of their valuable talents in the management of the finances, were overlooked by the inquisition, except now and then, when, having made too great a display of their wealth, they were squeezed a little; and therefore, not being able to enjoy their riches here, they sent them into other countries, and followed them at a proper time into places of greater freedom. The detached provinces of the Spanish empire were not less exposed than the seat of its government. Those sent to rule them had chiefly in view the repairing their own fortunes, and, in order to this, they made no scruple of multiplying those mischiefs, of which, at their arrival, they found too many; neighbouring potentates took their advantages likewise, and stood as little in fear of the log as they had formerly been afraid of the stork: hence it was that every court insulted that of Spain. France made incroachments in Biscay, in Roussillon, in the Low Countries. The elector of Brandenburgh, finding it impossible to recover by negotiation the subsidies that were due to him, withdrew his minister from Madrid, hired a small squadron of privateers, and took a Spanish vessel with a large sum on board, on the coast of the Low Countries. As the court of Madrid was too proud to enter into any liquidation of his demands till the ship was previously restored, he kept all, though he would have been content with what was his due. The Spanish governor of Buenos Ayres having dispossessed the Portuguese of a place they had seized, without any better title than convenience, the prince regent of Portugal took this up in such high terms, that though Spain insisted first upon her right, and her possession of one hundred and forty years, which she justified by a manifesto, yet in a month's time she negotiated this right away, and not only gave up the island in question, but confessed that she had no title to it.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

THE detail of the affairs of Spain is the history of Spain The violence at this juncture; a nation in such a condition can furnish no other history. The king reposed himself on his minister, and the several councils to which his predecessors had assigned the cognisance of different affairs; so that the appearance of government remained, though the spirit was almost extinguished. The duke de Medina Cæli was advised to establish a select council, with whom he might confer upon extraordinary occasions; but he apprehended, that, in doing this, his power would devolve upon that junta. He was at last forced to take this step, which had no considerable effect. There were, however, in Spain, men of parts and capacity, and particularly the two sons of Don Lewis de Haro, the marquis de Lich, who had made the treaty with Portugal, and the count de Monterey, who has been so often mentioned; but the former was sent ambassador to Rome, and kept there against his will; the latter was hated by the queen mother, always suspected, sometimes in disgrace. They were hated for their superior parts; and those who had the king's ear knew so well that a general reform would follow their Histoire generale d'Espagne, Memoires historiques & chronologiques. Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

1682, coming into power, that, for their own sakes, they kept them at a distance. The duke of Villahermosa had been admitted into the council, upon his return from the Low Countries, where he was succeeded by the prince of Parma, who could not prevent the county of Chinei from being seized by France; which having violated the peace on this side, from the same principle of ambition, put a garrison into Casal, to bridle Italy<sup>f</sup>. The next year the French king demanded the county of Alost, because it had been once in his possession, and he had never renounced it expressly, tho' at the treaty of Nimeguen it was restored to Spain. As this sacrifice was not easily made, Luxemburgh was blocked up. The sole resource of the court of Madrid was, to demand the assistance of her allies; but the emperor was engaged in a war with the Turks, the republic of Holland wanted the power, and the king of Great Britain was not in a condition to undertake the protection of the Austrian Netherlands, though his interest was deeply concerned in their safety. The government of them was at length confided to the marquis de Grana, a man of abilities and spirit, very capable of defending them, if the means had been in his power. The death of the queen of France, his catholic majesty's sister, was an additional misfortune, which was known and felt at Madrid, and, like other misfortunes, was esteemed without remedy<sup>g</sup>. Such was the situation of a power, which, in the memory of some then living, had given law to all Europe.

1683. By which, tho' unable to make, the Spaniards are provoked to declare, war. At this critical conjuncture the duke de Medina Cœli resigned his post of prime minister, that he might be free from that clamour which he found it impossible to remove any other way. But this had no visible effect upon public affairs, which went on still in the same way. The French king, under pretence of obtaining an equivalent for the county of Alost, besieged and took Courtray and Dixmude. The marquis de Grana, in order to push the allies of Spain to unite on the side of justice, and in her favour, declared war, and the prince of Orange did all that was in his power to engage the states to take the side of the injured at all events. But their tenderness for their own concerns, and their appre-

<sup>f</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Mercure Hollandois, sous l'an. 1681. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Corps Universel Diplomat. du Droit des Gens. <sup>g</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. LARREY, Histoire de Louis XIV. LIMIERS, Histoire du regne de Louis XIV. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

ensions of the vast power of an ambitious prince, who had no law but his will, restrained them. The project of the marquis, therefore, in this respect, became vain. But however, it set the arrogance of Lewis XIV. and his contempt of treaties, in their just light, and convinced all the powers in Europe, that all hopes of safety were vain, till this exorbitant power should be humbled. It is however true, that, notwithstanding this declaration of war, and the weakness of the Spaniards, France did not push her conquests in the Low Countries as she might have done. This did not arise from any moderation, but was founded on an apprehension of provoking the Dutch, by the approach of danger, to take that step, which, from a principle of equity, they had declined. To make the Spaniards thoroughly sensible of this, marshal Crequi was sent in the very depth of winter to bombard Luxemburgh; which he did with great fury, but without exciting, as was expected, any sedition in the place<sup>b</sup>. The princes and states of the empire saw the consequence of this clearly, but want of unanimity checked their resentment.

THE French beginning to assemble an army on the frontiers, the duke de Bournonville was sent in haste into Catalonia, where, while he was visiting the places, and assembling the troops, the French very unexpectedly penetrated into Navarre, where, except plundering some places of small importance, and spreading rumours, calculated to increase the discontents of the people, they did nothing worth mentioning. This gave the duke de Bournonville time to draw together what forces there were in Catalonia; so that when the French general the marshal de Bellefoins came to penetrate into that country by Roussillon, he found him very well posted, in order to dispute his passage. But the marshal, being superior in all respects, attacked and forced the duke at Ponte Mayor on the 12th of May, and thereby opened a passage to Gironne. The duke, however, threw into that place the best part of his infantry; so that when the marshal came to form the siege, he met with a much more obstinate resistance than he expected; however, having taken some outworks, and made a breach in the body of the place, he attempted it by assault, in which the French troops were not only repulsed, but were pursued to their camp with such vigour, that the marshal was obliged to raise the siege, and retire towards the sea coast, where, by the assistance of the French fleet, he made himself master of Palamos, and some other little places<sup>i</sup>. On the side of the Low Countries, the war was suspended, the French king having declared to the states general what at that time he was disposed to take from Spain; upon which he was willing to restore what he had already taken, and suspend his further demands for twenty years, adding, that if, in fourteen days after the taking Luxemburgh, which was besieged by marshal Cregui, they did not prevail upon his catholic majesty to accept, he would take such measures as the superiority of his power should enable him to do. The fortress of Luxemburgh, which had been invested in the beginning of May, held out till the 4th of June; and then the Spaniards, being convinced they had no assistance to hope, submitted to put their affairs into the hands of their friends; in consequence of which, the truce of Ratishon was subscribed on their behalf on the 10th of August, by which they abandoned Luxemburgh, and recovered Courtray and Dixmude, together with a great number of villages that had been taken from them since the treaty of Nimeguen. As this was a measure equally repugnant to the interests and honour of Spain, the ratification came but slowly from Madrid; so that, when it arrived, the French demanded upwards of ten millions of livres for contributions; but, upon the interposition of the king of Great Britain, condescended to accept four millions, which was all that the people had in the world, and, which is still more extraordinary, caused a medal to be struck, to perpetuate the memory of this wonderful act of condescension<sup>k</sup>. But how much soever this might amuse his own subjects, the rest of Europe saw it with amazement.

<sup>a</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. LARREY, QUINCY, Mercure Hollandois, sous l'an. 1683. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, LIMIERS, Histoire du regne de Louis XIV. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Histoire generale d'Espagne,

1684.

This confirms his catholic majesty to begin a re-

At Madrid the king began to apply himself with more steadiness than usual to the conduct of public affairs, and shewed such a sensibility of the state in which he found the generality of his subjects, as very speedily produced many salutary regulations, which had an extreme good effect; but

<sup>i</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Mercure Hollandois, sous l'an 1684. REINCOURT, LARREY. <sup>k</sup> BUSSI, Histoire de Louis le Grand, Memoires historiques & chronologiques, QUINCY, & al. ubi sup. LIMIERS, Memoires du Marq. FEUQUIERES, Corps Universel Diplomat. du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. P. ii. p. 79. Hist. de la vie & du regne de Louis XIV. par M. BRUZEN DE LA MARTINIERE, tom. iv. p. 291.

which

which would have been much more effectual, if they had <sup>formation</sup> been begun earlier, or if they had been conducted with <sup>in affairs</sup> greater judgment. Through his endeavour to correct lux- <sup>at home;</sup> ury; many foreign commodities and manufactures were prohibited, and, for example-sake, some seized and burnt, which disobliged the Dutch, a thing by no means seasonable. In order to ease the people, some heavy taxes were abolished; but as the income arising from those taxes were mortgaged, it raised a clamour amongst the assentists, or public creditors, who were not those artful and cunning persons who had raised fortunes to themselves from the necessities of the government, but honest people, who had purchased those securities at a high rate, and were now deprived of their subsistence. The king, therefore, caused a new fund to be settled, without reviving the old taxes for the payment of their interest; but, as it arose from suppressing of pensions, the clamour was only varied; and as this regulation was ascribed to the count de Oropesa, the king's favourite, who, by the way, was of the house of Braganza, and the next heir male to the crown of Portugal, it drew upon him a degree of hatred that made him very uneasy. In the mean time the marquis de Grana died at Brussels, and the government of the Low Countries per interim devolved on Don Francisco Antonio de Agurto, marquis de Gastanaga. Some other changes were made, and the imperial minister had now a greater influence than ever at the court of Madrid<sup>1</sup>; which was exceedingly serviceable to the interests of the house of Austria, and accidentally to those of Europe.

It has been observed, that there is no branch in politics to <sup>and to con-</sup> which the Spaniards may with so much justice pretend as <sup>cert mea-</sup> impenetrable secrecy. While they appeared to be intirely <sup>sures for</sup> taken up with their domestic concerns, and to have nothing <sup>circum-</sup> so much at heart as restoring the interior of their administra- <sup>scribing</sup> tion, their ministers in all the courts of Europe, who were <sup>the power</sup> generally speaking men of sense and experience, deplored <sup>of France,</sup> the exorbitant growth of the French power, magnified their <sup>with other</sup> own losses incurred by daring to stand up against it; and suggested, that such as were partners in calamity ought naturally to become allies to each other to prevent being gradually destroyed. In Italy the spirit of pope Innocent XI. was kept up, notwithstanding France had already given him ill usage, and threatened worse. No pains were spared by Don Pedro Ronquillo, at London, to detach king James the second from his close connection with France, which lessened

<sup>1</sup> Memoires de la Cour d'Espagne.

him as much with the popish powers as his religion did with the protestants. In Holland memorials of a like nature were presented, and the states solicited with great assiduity to enter into some measures for the protection of what was still left of the Spanish Low Countries. But in the midst of these insinuations, remonstrances, and applications, a minister on the behalf of his catholic majesty, signed, with all possible secrecy, the league at Augsbourg, on the 29th of June<sup>m</sup>, into which the emperor, the crown of Sweden, the elector of Bavaria, and other princes and circles of the empire, the king of Spain himself representing the circle of Burgundy, entered, for the protection of their respective dominions, and for the maintenance of the peace of Nimeguen, and the late truce for twenty years: for this purpose their respective quotas were assigned, his electoral highness of Bavaria declared general of the allies, and a military chest established at Francfort. But the prince of Orange and the states, upon whom the allies chiefly depended, were not, for certain reasons, amongst the number of the contracting parties. The French king, exceedingly provoked by the discourses of the Spanish ministers before-mentioned, but unwilling to violate openly the truce of Ratisbon so soon after it was concluded, took a new method of venting his resentment. As he had the year before bombarded Genoa, because the republic had built four gallees that might possibly join the Spanish fleet, so now he sent marshal d'Etraes with a powerful squadron into the Mediterranean, who very unexpectedly appeared before Cadiz, where, after taking two galleons in the sight of ten Dutch men of war, he demanded half a million of crowns for losses sustained by the French merchants in Mexico, that is, the value of their goods taken in illicit trade, for which he obtained the promise of full and immediate satisfaction. This was an additional insult, and more than was necessary to convince the ministers at Madrid how good a neighbour they had in this potent prince. The additional affront, therefore, of setting up posts upon a common at a small distance from Namur, with inscriptions, declaring it to be within the territories of France, with hints, that a citadel might possibly be built there, was a wanton display of a superiority of power, that, whatever the French ministers fancied<sup>n</sup>, was not altogether so mortifying to the Spaniards as was intended. On the contrary, these exorbitancies, which at another time would have been intolerable, were in some measure welcome at present.

<sup>m</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 131. 133. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Louis XIV. par Mons. L'ABBE DE CHOISY, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

THE great projects that were now upon the carpet obliged the king to pursue the reformation he had begun. The marquis de los Velos was placed at the head of the finances, in order to carry into execution a new alteration in the coin, which occasioned loud and general complaints, more especially from the French and English ministers, the former insisting, that the money due to the French merchants should be paid upon the old foot; and the latter, that the subjects of Great Britain should be exempted from this order. The king's answer was sensible and steady: "With respect to public contracts and old debts, he admitted the demand to be reasonable; but, in respect to subsequent transactions, his measures had been taken with deliberation, and he could not recede." Abundance of founding military titles, with good appointments, which those who held them never executed, were suppressed, and a multitude of supernumerary offices in the law had the same fate. The court was visibly changed for the better; and that change would have been still more conspicuous, if the king's heart had not been equally divided between the two queens. His consort had a fever, and the queen mother did all she could to prevent the king from visiting her, but without effect, though his tenderness in this respect cost him a fit of sickness. On the other hand, the queen mother prevailed to keep the duke of Medina Cœli in exile, and even procured an order for the return of Valenzuela, notwithstanding it was strenuously opposed; but the king, being made sensible of the consequences, secretly countermanded it.

THE court of France, having intelligence of the league of Augsbourg, proposed to his catholic majesty, after making the like offer to the emperor, to convert the truce of twenty years into a perpetual peace upon the same or like terms, and had the mortification to receive such answers from Vienna and Madrid, as plainly demonstrated the two courts acted in concert. However, the dispute, or rather the quarrel, commenced with the Spaniards the year before, was amicably adjusted, but, as usual, at their expence, by an exchange of certain lands for the common, in the vicinity of Namur. The war with the Moors gave the Spanish court an opportunity of equipping a considerable squadron of gallies, and repairing some men of war, without giving umbrage; the marquis de Gastanaga was confirmed in his government of the Low Countries, but was so indifferently supplied, that most of the troops there deserted for want of pay, which the French saw with no small satisfaction, though this would have been very much diminished, if they had known the true cause at that time, which they afterwards published, in their declaration of war, to be the accommodating the prince of Orange with very considerable supplies for the expedition which he then meditated; neither would they have been free from chagrin, if they had discovered the share the Spanish ministers certainly had in determining the duke of Savoy no longer to bear the ill usage he received from Monsieur de Louvois, and their intrigues in other courts in Italy, where, being now so little formidable, they had so much the better interest <sup>p</sup>.

The queen mother's influence, and the strange uses she made of it.

1687.

His catholic majesty has a very large share in the revolution in Great Britain.

As with much diligence and sagacity in strengthening the confederacy against France.

In the beginning of the year the court of Spain was exceedingly alarmed by the king's falling dangerously ill, during which time the queen mother assumed the power of excluding the queen consort her husband's chamber. Upon his recovery, the queen mother thought fit to let the duke of Medina Cœli come to court; but he paid pretty dear for that favour, since she obliged him to surrender all his great offices, which she immediately distributed amongst her creatures. To prevent his becoming popular, she divulged, that he was the concealed author of all the new regulations, and that he had sacrificed all things, that he might gain access to the king, in order to give him the necessary lights for carrying those regulations into execution, from whence he came to be reputed the best patriot in Spain, and, though not employed, was as much trusted by the king as ever <sup>q</sup>. In Catalonia the marquis de Leganex, who was viceroy, attempting to put the province in a posture of defence, fell into such hatred with the people, that he demanded to be recalled; upon which the king, or rather the queen mother, took him at his word, and sent thither the count de Melgar. In the autumn the queen consort fell ill of the small-pox, of which she recovered, and, during the whole time of her distemper, the king expressed great tenderness for her. Yet there was a rumour, as if the disposition of the court of Rome had been founded about a divorce, on account of the queen's sterility, and that the king might have an opportunity of marrying the infanta of Portugal. In respect to foreign affairs, his majesty laboured earnestly to persuade the emperor into a peace with the Turks, and continued his correspondencies in Italy, where his influence began to revive, in proportion as his power was less feared. The Moors having besieged Oran with a great force, the king Don Carlos, who could not have done it perhaps any other way, relieved it by a stroke of wit. As soon as he received the news, he made it public, adding, that if this misfortune had happened to his most Christian majesty he must have published a proclamation for restraining the nobility from going thither without leave. The Spanish lords took the hint; two hundred of them went at their own expence, and raised the siege. Count Tourville, with three French men of war, meeting rear-admiral Pacpachin with two Spanish men of war in the Mediterranean, as they did not immediately lower their topsails, fired upon them, and, after a long engagement, obliged them to salute him. The court of Madrid was forced to digest this, and to send orders to the court of Castanaga to temporize in the Low Countries, as their schemes were not yet ripe. However, a plate fleet arrived at Cadiz; and, though the king could keep but very little of its contents, yet it gave him fresh credit; and to a court in such circumstances this was of great use.

<sup>p</sup> Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. Mercure historique & politique, 1687. Histoire generale d'Espagne. <sup>q</sup> Mémoires de la Cour d'Espagne, Histoire generale d'Espagne,

1682.

THE death of the queen of Spain, after an illness of three days, on the 12th of February, made a great change in the face of affairs, more especially as the French gave out very positively, that she died of poison<sup>a</sup>. A modern writer<sup>b</sup>, after citing the memoirs of a person of distinction, in which it is asserted, that Louis XIV. affirmed so much at supper, treats it as a fable; but this is certain, that it was believed at the time, and that it was expected the French court would have published a manifesto upon it. However, she was buried with little ceremony, and, which was thought extraordinary, her household kept up; but the reason quickly appeared; for, in the space of about two months, the king's marriage was declared with the princess Mary Anne, daughter to the elector palatine, and, on the 15th of June following, he espoused her by proxy<sup>c</sup>. There were two powerful motives to this marriage, first, that she was sister to the reigning empress and the queen of Portugal; the other, that his queen, his second marriage,

Death of
and breaking out of a new war.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Quincy, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

<sup>b</sup> Mercure historique & poli-

tique, 1686. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>c</sup> Le Siecle

de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, tom. ii. p. 63.

<sup>d</sup> Histoire

generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, 1689.

she was young, handsome, and of a family remarkable for their fertility; to which we may add, that the match was agreeable to the queen mother, who now governed all. The marquis de Ribaynac pressed the king, in the name of his most Christian majesty, to declare what part he would take; upon which the king proposed a neutrality, which the marquis told him his master would not accept, and soon after the French declared war. That declaration was answered by the marquis de Gastanaga in very strong terms: and both in Spain and in the Low Countries all commerce was prohibited, and, by the catholic king's order, all French effects were seized<sup>w</sup>. The duke de Noailles took the field early on the side of Roussillon, and made himself master of the town and castle of Campredon; but the duke de Villahermosa, who commanded in Catalonia, marched against him with a superior army, invested his new conquest, into which the French had put a strong garrison, and, with some difficulty the duke de Noailles disengaged them, and blew up the place, but not without considerable loss. The Spaniards continued to press the enemy all the rest of the campaign, and levied great contributions in Roussillon, so that on this side they were clearly victorious. In Flanders the French proposed to take three or four of the best places the king of Spain had left; but the Dutch and Brandenburgh troops coming early to the assistance of the marquis of Gastanaga, preserved them all; and marshal Humieres having received a severe check from prince Waldeck at Valcourt, on the 20th of August, the rest of the campaign was not very fertile in events<sup>x</sup>. In Barbary his catholic majesty was less fortunate; for the famous Muley Ismael, emperor of Morocco, having invested Larache, took it, after a long and obstinate siege, notwithstanding it was very gallantly defended by a garrison of one thousand men, and, being carried by storm, a great part of them were cut to pieces<sup>y</sup>; the rest, who retired to the castle, were obliged to surrender at discretion, and mouldered away in dungeons, that barbarous prince refusing to ransom them, though he sent over a minister to Spain, under colour of treating on this subject, who concluded a convention, which the emperor immediately disavowed.

<sup>w</sup> Corps Univ. Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 221. 226.

<sup>x</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. LIMIER, Histoire du regne de Louis XIV. LARREY, Histoire de Louis XIV. Mercure historique & politique, Memoires historiques & chronologiques. <sup>y</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

WE have before mentioned the insurrection in Catalonia <sup>Conse-</sup> against the marquis de Leganez, and the complaisance of <sup>quences at-</sup> the king in recalling that nobleman. This, it seems, had <sup>tending</sup> a bad effect; for the peasants, pretending that their privi- <sup>this mar-</sup> leges were violated by quartering troops amongst them, tho' <sup>riage, and</sup> for their own protection, assembled in great multitudes, and <sup>the events</sup> attempted to seize the duke of Villahermosa, who quickly <sup>of the se-</sup> disengaged himself, and obliged them to retire to the moun- <sup>cond cam-</sup> tains nearest Barcelona. There, in a sudden fit of repentance, they cut off the head of one of their chiefs, and sent it to the duke, promising the utmost submission for the future; upon which he immediately proclaimed a general pardon. But this was only to gain time, and to amuse; for, having received assurances of succours from France, they took up arms again, and made a powerful diversion in favour of the enemy<sup>a</sup>. The new queen made her public entry into Madrid on the 22d of June, with great magnificence; she brought with her her brother, the grand master of the Teutonic order, and several other persons of distinction. The king, to shew his great affection for her, created count Mansfield, who went into Germany to conclude the marriage, and to bring her into Spain, prince of Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples; and the queen mother expressed the same fondness for her as if she had been her own daughter<sup>a</sup>. The new pope, Alexander VIII. exhorted the king to peace; which gave him an opportunity of publishing one of the best penned answers that ever came from the court of Madrid, in which all the violences committed by Louis XIV. were strongly tho' succinctly set forth; and in which it is observed, that as there was not a single power in Europe, his holiness not excepted, whom at some time or other he had not injured, oppressed, and insulted, it was therefore become necessary, for the peace and safety of Christendom, to weaken an exorbitant power which was the continual instrument of pride and ambition; so that this war was not only to be considered as just and necessary, till that purpose was answered, but perfectly consistent with the duties of Christian princes, bound to protect their subjects against a prince, whom no considerations of justice or humanity could restrain, and who had so often and so notoriously violated the most solemn treaties<sup>b</sup>. In consequence of these maxims, he concluded a treaty with the duke of Savoy, in pursuance of which that prince en-1690.

<sup>a</sup> Quincy, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. <sup>a</sup> Mer-
cure historique & politique. 1690. Histoire generale d'Espagne.
<sup>b</sup> Mercur historique & politique.

tered into the general alliance<sup>c</sup>. The campaign in Catalonia had been still a better commentary upon his catholic majesty's manifesto, if the disturbances before-mentioned had not hindered the duke of Villahermosa from taking the field so early as otherwise he would have done; but when he was at last able to act against the French, he compelled the duke of Noailles to retire, and would have forced him to a battle if that cautious officer had not exerted his utmost skill to prevent it. However, the Spanish fleet made a descent on the coast, and burnt all the country about Perpignan. In Flanders, notwithstanding the loss of the battle of Flerus, the Spaniards were no great sufferers; and France saw with regret, that she was no longer able to make those terrible impressions which had rendered her so formidable to her neighbours but a few years before. The Moors threatened much this year, which obliged the Spaniards to send such timely succours; that, after a few faint attempts, the infidels quitted the field<sup>d</sup>.

Count
Oropesa
disgraced,
on account of the new regulations
in the finances.

1691.

AT a season when the Spaniards were so much distressed for money, that no better method could be devised for the present than laying open the necessities of the public to the grandees, and, depending on their public spirit, to do for the crown what the crown was unable to do for itself, the galleons arrived safely at Cadiz with thirty millions on board. This had a very happy effect, and enabled his majesty to make remittances into Italy and the Low Countries, where all things suffered grievously for want of the stipulated supplies. The marquis de Leganez was sent governor general into the duchy of Milan, where he found things in great disorder, which, with much vigilance and activity, he laboured to repair<sup>e</sup>. The duke de Medina Cœli, upon whom the king always relied, deceased after a long illness; and the count de Oropesa, who succeeded when the duke was obliged to resign his office of prime minister, was so much and so generally hated, that the king was obliged to part with him. In the month of September his majesty was so dangerously ill, that all Spain expected his death, and could hardly be persuaded that it was possible for him to recover. It was upon this illness that the world began freely to canvass the succession; and that some proposed sending for the young archduke, and giving him the title of presumptive successor; while others insinuated, that perhaps a good peace might be made by adopting the second son of the dauphin, who, as they understood it, had the better title of the two. The king's recovery put an end for the present to these intrigues; till the queen's falling more dangerously ill, introduced some of another kind. However, contrary even to the sentiments of the physicians, she likewise recovered<sup>f</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 265.

<sup>d</sup> Relation de la Bataille de Fleurus, Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, BURNET'S History of his own Times, LE CLERC, LIMIERS, LARREY, FEUQUIERES, REINCOURT.

<sup>e</sup> Mercure historique & politique, 1691.

In relation to the progress of the war, the coasts of Spain <sup>The third</sup> suffered extremely from the French fleet commanded by mar- <sup>campaign</sup>shal d'Etrees, which first bombarded Barcelona; and, after <sup>in Flan-</sup>ruining part of that fine city, did still more mischief at Ali- <sup>ders more</sup> cant. This incensed the people to such a degree, that <sup>particu-</sup>they plundered, and were with difficulty hindered from mur- <sup>larly un-</sup>dering, all the French settled amongst them. The duke <sup>fortunate</sup> de Medina Sidonia was sent viceroy into Catalonia, merely to <sup>to Spain</sup>please the people. He managed the war but very indifferently, though he had a better army than his predecessor. Marshal Noailles took Urgel, and made incursions into the kingdom of Arragon. The Spanish duke, having superior forces, marched towards him, as if he would give him battle; but afterwards amused himself with besieging a place of no great consequence, and that in so strange a manner, as induced count Pignatelli, who commanded under him, to retire with the best part of the army to Barcelona: this forced the duke to follow him, and both parties appealed in justification of their conduct to the court of Spain, which had no great reason to be satisfied with either<sup>g</sup>. In Flanders Mons was taken on the 9th of April, after a short siege, in the sight, as the French were pleased to say, and to the terror, of all Europe; but, it is certain, with so much amazement to the Spanish court, that the ministers would have been willing, if they had thought it practicable, to conceal it from the king. His knowledge of it, however, had a very good effect, for he resolved immediately to perform what had been more than once under consideration, the detaching in some measure from the crown these distant dominions. Accordingly at the close of the year letters patents were dispatched declaring his serene highness, the elector of Bavaria hereditary governor of the Low Countries, with incomparably higher powers than had been granted to the archduke Leopold, or to Don Juan of Austria, with a promise of a punctual subsidy of 75,000 pieces of eight per month. This measure is by some ascribed intirely to the influence of king William's councils ; whereas others affirm that it had been stipulated some years before, upon the elector's marriage with the king's niece. It is not improbable that both may be true ; and that, after so long a delay, his catholic majesty was at length determined to this step by the representations of king William, who knew by experience the great difficulty, or rather impossibility, of concerting proper measures for the defence of countries of such consequence to the maritime powers, with governors seldom continued above three years, generally intent upon making their private fortunes, and who could do nothing of moment till they received orders from Madrid<sup>b</sup>, where they were not always the best judges of things at such a distance.

<sup>f</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique.

<sup>g</sup> LARREY, Histoire de Louis XIV. QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.

Things go pretty equally on both sides
in the fourth.

1692.

As the former, so this year, opened with a most agreeable and seasonable supply, the galleons returning from America with forty-eight millions on board, of which the king had four by way of indulto, which enabled him to send very large sums into the Low Countries and Italy ; but his finances, notwithstanding, were in great disorder, and therefore a new junta was appointed to bring them under proper regulations, at the head of which was the count de Monterey. One of their first resolutions was to examine into the conduct of such as had been formerly trusted ; and, that it might appear they were in earnest, the marquis de Gassanaga no sooner arrived in Spain, than he was sent prisoner to the castle of Burgos, with a note of the immense sums he had received, and an intimation that he must give an exact account of what was become of them<sup>d</sup>. The queen dowager of England, passing through Spain into her native country of Portugal, was complimented by a person of distinction on the part of his catholic majesty, at Valladolid. The Spanish fleet, under the command of admiral Papachin, failed to Genoa, which induced that republic to act for the service of the emperor, and the rest of the allies : and the same fleet was very serviceable afterwards to the duke of Savoy, in his glorious campaign against the French. The marquis de Conflans was appointed viceroy of Catalonia ; but it was so late in the year before he arrived, that the duke commanded the Spanish army, which however did nothing very considerable.

<sup>b</sup> Mercuré historique & politique, QUINCY, LE CLERC, BURNET, REINCOURT, LIMIERS. <sup>d</sup> LARREY, Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

On the other hand, marshal Neailles, being obliged to make a great detachment to reinforce the army employed against the duke of Savoy, was not in a condition to do much. As for the French fleet under marshal d'Etrees, it was so roughly handled by the elements, that, though it appeared before Malaga, and threatened a bombardment, yet, after exchanging some civilities, such as releasing prisoners on one side, and receiving provisions on the other, it quitted the coast. In Flanders, the loss of the important city and fortrefs of Namur, after a month's siege, and the defeat at Steenkirk, could not but chagrin the court, which however was in some measure consoled by certain applications, that plainly shewed that France was not only disposed to make, but was even desirous of purchasing a peace; an inclination she had never discovered before <sup>k</sup>.

THE pains taken by his catholic majesty and his ministers, Two par- in regulating the finances, had a very good effect, and ties alrea- brought the ordinary expences of the government into a dyformed proper method; but the unforeseen emergencies of the war in the threw them, notwithstanding, into such distress, as might council, as easily have undone all they had been doing, if, upon mature to the suc- deliberation, they had not taken the same measure they took cession. before of engaging the public to relieve itself. The great councils paid each a certain sum, the grandees and officers of the court did the like; their examples were followed by the cities and great towns, so that a very large sum was levied for once. In order to remedy the state of their military affairs, and that they might have troops when and where-ever they were wanted, the king appointed four lieutenant-generals to have the superintendence in that respect of all Spain. These were quickly reduced to three; for the count de Monterey, who was of the number, desired to be excused; and soon after he refused a civil employment of great consequence, which was then ascribed to discontent, but it appeared afterwards that he meditated a retreat from the world, which he executed, and went into orders. The marquis de Gastanaga 1693; made a very good precedent for subsequent governors, since, after the strictest examination, he was found to have behaved himself, during the time he administered the affairs of the Low Countries, with great integrity and honour; so that, in approbation of his conduct, as well as in reward for his services, he was made viceroy of Catalonia; but he refusing that employment, it was bestowed on the marquis of Villena. The rumour of the queen's being with child excited for some time a general joy throughout the nation, which gradually sunk when it was known to be a mistake, and, upon this, the intrigues to engage his catholic majesty to settle the succession were renewed with greater vigour than ever<sup>m</sup>. The queen mother, and the count de Oropesa, who still retained no small credit with his master, were vigorous in the support of the electoral prince of Bavaria; but the cardinals Portocarrero and Cordova, Don Juan Henriques de Cabrera, the count de Aguilar, the marquis de Villafranca, and other great politicians, declared in favour of the archduke Charles, the emperor's second son; and at this time his interest seemed to be the best of the two, though it was a chapter not very pleasing to the monarch, whose will was to settle the right of these contending princes, and, except count Lobkowitz the imperial minister, none of the ambassadors of the allies could be brought to interfere<sup>n</sup>, as apprehending it equally unpleasant and indecent.

<sup>k</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. BURNET's History of his own Times, Memoires historiques & politiques, REINCOURT, Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne, LIMIERS, LARREY, LE CLERC, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

Spain and
her new allies have the worst almost on every side
in the first campaign.

MARSHALL Tourville, with the French fleet, hovered upon the coast of Spain, which filled the court with apprehensions either of a descent or a bombardment; at length he appeared before Roses in Catalonia about the beginning of June, and the place was at the same time invested by land, the French army being commanded by marshal Noailles. Their operations were commenced by a bombardment, in which the governor being dangerously wounded, the place capitulated on the 9th, and it was upon this misfortune that the ministers demanded a free gift<sup>o</sup>. The marshal de Tourville, towards the latter end of the same month, surprised the Smyrna fleet, destroyed four men of war, and either took, sunk, or burnt, 80 English and Dutch ships richly laden. This action happened between Lagos and Cadiz; but the enemy pursued the ships into the Spanish ports, and burnt many of them under the guns of their fortresses<sup>p</sup>. The rest of the campaign in Catalonia was spent in marches and countermarches; the duke de Medina Sidonia commanding the Spanish army, as the marquis de Villena was not sent thither till towards the close of the year. The Spanish fleet remained this summer on the coast of Italy; and his catholic majesty applied to the maritime powers to send a naval force sufficient to cover his dominions the next year, in pursuance of a treaty made with the crown of Great Britain two years before. As to the military operations in Flanders, they were far enough from being successful. Furnes and Dixmude were taken at the very beginning of the campaign. Marshal Luxemburgh had the advantage in the battle of Nerwind, fought on the 29th of July, in which some Spanish volunteers of distinction were killed. But the most mortifying stroke was the loss of Charleroi, defended by the marquis of Castillo, with a garrison of four thousand five hundred men, after twenty-seven days open trenches. The army of France was commanded by marshal Villeroi, and was covered by another army under the command of marshal Luxemburgh. The attacks were directed by Monsieur Vauban, who had fortified the place, and was therefore supposed to be best acquainted it, yet, by an unaccountable mistake, he attacked it where it was strongest. After all these misfortunes, the pope's nuncio insinuated at Madrid his most Christian majesty's inclination to peace, which was rejected with great firmness, as overtures of the like kind were by the rest of the allies.

<sup>m</sup> Memoires & Negotiations secretes du Comte d'HARRACH, Mercure historique & politique.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires & Negotiations secretes du Comte d'HARRACH. <sup>o</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. LIMIERS, Histoire du regne de Louis XIV. BURNET's History of his own Times, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

His catholic majesty having received from his allies an However, account of the propositions made to them on the part of steadily re- France, in which there were some insinuations in regard to ject all settling the succession of his dominions, he thought fit to proposi- write a letter, dated the 23d of January, to the states ge- tions for neral, in which he assured them of his resolution to carry peace, and on the war, mentioned his having taken notice of those infi- labour to nuations, and considered them with horror and execrations, raise sup- adding, that he hoped Heaven, in compliance with the fervent plies for prayers of his subjects, would yet grant him a successor. the war, The galleons arrived this year with sixteen millions, of which the king had but a small share. The junta for reforming the management of the finances had recourse to many expedients, and yet were not able to furnish the subsidies that had been promised to the duke of Savoy and the elector of Bavaria. The scarcity of men also was almost as great as 1694.

P BURNET'S History of his own Times, LE CLERC, LIMIERS.
 1 Mercure historique & politique, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV.
 2 REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV.
 LARREY, Memoires du Marquis de FEUQUIERES, Le Siecle de Louis XIV.
 3 Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

that of money ; and the factions that reigned at court, where those who opposed the French interest were divided among themselves, did not a little contribute to distract their measures, and to frustrate some of their best-concerted undertakings. It was owing to these that the marquis de Villena and duke of Escalona, one of the wisest and worthiest men in Spain, could not assemble above sixteen thousand men in Catalonia, and part of these raw troops, though he had been assured they would enable him to take the field early, and with an army superior to that of the enemy. His presence was acceptable to the people ; the ministers knew it, and hoped they would assist him ; notwithstanding which, they did what was in their power ; but, all things taken together, he had not above half of what was really requisite for him to defend the province committed to his charge. This was notwithstanding the point most attended to, and we may conceive from thence what became of the rest, and how easily miscarriages in Spain might be accounted for.

The sixth campaign somewhat less unfortunate than the last.

THE French king and his ministers, who, for many reasons, but more especially that they might dissolve the grand alliance, were become very desirous of peace, believed that nothing could contribute to it so much as pushing the Spaniards in Catalonia : for this reason marshal Tourville was sent with a fleet in the spring upon that coast ; and marshal Noailles, with 30,000 men, entered the Spanish frontiers in the beginning of May. The duke of Escalona endeavoured to defend the banks of the river Ter, though it was fordable in many places ; he performed this as well as it was possible, but the duke of Noailles forced the passage on the 22d of May, after an obstinate resistance, in which the Spaniards lost about 2000 men. He afterwards took Palamos, with the assistance of the fleet, and then besieged Gironne. The place was strong, and had a good garrison, but very unluckily composed of new troops, who deserted the works, and obliged the governor to capitulate in less than a week. The marshal afterwards made himself master of Ostelrich, upon which the duke of Escalona threw himself into Barcelona<sup>u</sup>. When the campaign was over, the king prevailed upon the marquis de Gastanaga to accept of that government. The fleet of the allies, under the command of admiral Russell, came, as the king desired, into the Mediterranean, and continued there the whole year, with which he was so pleased, that he sent a jewel to the admiral valued at fourscore thousand crowns. The Moors besieged Ceuta and Melilla, but without effect. The campaign in Flanders was barren of events. Huy and Dixmude were retaken by the allies; and, if they were no gainers, the Spaniards had however the satisfaction of losing nothing, and of seeing France more and more oppressed by the length and weight of the war<sup>w</sup>; to which a kind of famine, which prevailed in that kingdom, did not a little contribute.

<sup>u</sup> Mercure historique & politique.
toire de Louis XIV. LIMIERS, QUINEY, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

<sup>u</sup> REINCOURT, Histoire de Louis XIV.

As the junta for the improvement of the finances, which the Spaniards as well as we called the junta or committee of ways and means, had daily more and more success, a resolution was taken of bringing over a body of German and Italian troops, to augment the forces in Catalonia; which however had been impracticable, but for the assistance of the fleet of the allies, by whom it was executed without any difficulty. The death of queen Mary of England was esteemed so great a misfortune, that the court of Spain not only went into deep mourning, but directed their ministers in all foreign courts to do the same<sup>x</sup>. Their catholic majesties were both indisposed this year, and, as had fallen out more than once before, the queen's illness was very industriously ascribed to a miscarriage, which perhaps she never had<sup>y</sup>. In Catalonia the marquis de Gastanaga did wonders; for, instead of keeping the field with the regular troops, he applied himself with indefatigable diligence to discipline the militia and the peasants; and, as the French had fortified and put garrisons into many places, he contrived sometimes to block up one, sometimes another, chiefly with a view to cut off the convoys and detachments sent to relieve them, in which he was very successful. The French viceroy (for marshal Noailles had that title) being much indisposed, quitted his employment, in which he was replaced by the duke of Vendôme, who turned this method of making war upon the Spaniards, by demolishing and abandoning most of those small places, and harrassing the troops of the count of Gastanaga, sent to repair them; but, upon the whole, the Spaniards were gainers by this campaign<sup>z</sup>. In Italy, with the assistance of Spanish troops and money, the duke of Savoy reduced Casal; the fortifications of which being demolished, the town was restored to its natural sovereign, the duke of

But, in the seventh,
things change
their aspect, and go on much better.
1695.

<sup>w</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, LE CLERC, LIMIER.
<sup>x</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. LARREY, REIN-COURT, Histoire de Louis XIV. <sup>y</sup> Mercure historique
& politique. <sup>z</sup> Histoire du regne de Louis XIV.

Mantua <sup>a</sup>. In Flanders, marshal Villeroy bombarded Brussels the 13th, 14th, and 15th, of August, during which he threw several thousand bombs and red-hot bullets into the place, by which he did a great deal of mischief, but at the same time excited an implacable hatred to the French, and brought upon himself the imputation of having done it in a fit of despair. Namur surrendered on the fourth of August, and the citadel on the second of September, notwithstanding Villeroi had threatened to fight the army of the allies commanded by king William, which he durst not perform. These successes on every side raised the spirits of the Spanish ministers, and confirmed them in their inclinations to carry on the war <sup>b</sup>.

The duke of Savoy makes a separate peace, and acts against the Spaniards in the Milanese.

THE supplies from the Indies not arriving, the ministers found themselves exceedingly distressed for money, which induced them to put a tax, or rather a fine, upon all the lucrative governments, which proved a good expedient, tho' attended with ill consequences. The death of the queen mother on the 16th of May produced no great alterations at court, as it had been long expected. Her disease was a cancer of many years continuance; and, as she had been long in a dying condition, she had in a manner outlived her credit <sup>c</sup>. It was not, however, till after her decease that the count de Oropeza came publicly to court, and was again admitted into the king's councils. In the month of September their catholic majesties were both very much indisposed, and it was some time before the king found himself well enough to appear in public, which occasioned a general consternation through his dominions, and great distraction in his councils, more especially since at this time there was nothing regulated as to the succession <sup>d</sup>. The Moors had lain two years before Ceuta, with a numerous army; it was first defended by the marquis de Valparaiso, with invincible courage, and afterwards with indefatigable diligence by the marquis de Avallaneda, who was sent to relieve it; so that, after losing 15,000 men, and being in the field twenty-five months, the infidels abandoned their design. The marquis de Castanaga, finding it impracticable to struggle with the

<sup>a</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, LARRY, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

<sup>b</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Mercure historique & politique.

<sup>c</sup> Mercure historique & politique, 1696. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>d</sup> Memoires & Negotiations secretes du Comte de HARRAC.

difficulties to which his post was exposed, and the haughty temper of the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who commanded the German troops, resigned his viceroyalty, and was succeeded by Don Francisco de Velasco. The duke of Vendosme, who had the title of viceroy from the king of France, gained some advantage over the prince of Hesse; and, except a dispute at the beginning, there happened nothing of consequence during this campaign, the duke's army being but weak<sup>e</sup>. In Italy things took a very ill turn; for the duke of Savoy, who had renewed his treaty with the allies but the year before, and demanded extraordinary succours in men and money, to protect his capital from being besieged by the French, acted therein but a delusive part, as having made a secret treaty with France. At length having separated the foreign auxiliaries into different posts, he declared for a neutrality in Italy; and, as the Spaniards did not readily embrace it, he put himself at the head of the French army, and besieged Valenza, which, through the care of the marquis de Leganez, was in a good state of defence. However, as the courts of Vienna and Madrid found it impossible to regain him, tho' they offered the duchy of Milan in property, and were also apprised that most of the Italian powers approved his measures, they were obliged to comply, and accept a neutrality likewise<sup>f</sup>. In Flanders, though the French and the allies had great armies, and though the latter were commanded by king William and the elector of Bavaria in person, yet in effect there was little or nothing done, no battle fought; no place so much as besieged; but, towards the end of the year, plenipotentiaries were appointed, and a place settled for a congress, which seemed to explain the inactivity of the preceding campaign<sup>g</sup>.

In Spain the winters are generally sharp, and yet a very hard winter is a rare thing. This proved so severe, that his catholic majesty diverted himself with seeing some Dutch sailors skate upon the ice at Madrid. The want of money, and the necessity of finding it, being equally great, the ministers had once more recourse to a free gift, to which some of the grandees, when they had given what they could afford, added the profit of their offices, which they sold for

By this, and the taking Ath, Barcelona, and Carthagena, the Spaniards

<sup>e</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>f</sup> BURNET'S History of his own Times, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 368. LARREY, Actes, Memoires, & Negociations, de la Paix de Ryswick, edit. de la Haye, 1725, <sup>g</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

are forced into the peace of Ryswick.

1697.

the public benefit. In the mean time arrived the galleons with thirty millions, out of which the king's share was not much, and the demands from Catalonia were very high. Lewis XIV. finding that he could easily compromise matters with the maritime powers, offered, in complaisance to the Spaniards, a neutrality in Catalonia, which they absolutely rejected. Upon this, the army of the prince of Hesse Darmstadt was very considerably augmented, the fortifications of Barcelona repaired, and directions given for a fleet. But while they were executing in the Spanish way, that is, very slowly, the duke of Noailles took the field with a numerous army, attended with a fine train of artillery, and directed his march immediately towards that city. At the same time the count d'Etrees and the bailiff de Noailles appeared upon the coast, one with a large fleet, and the other with a strong squadron of galleys, so that the place was quickly invested by land and by sea, though not completely, for the prince of Hesse, who had thrown himself into it with the best part of the infantry, had still a communication with the viceroy, who, with between six and seven thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, were encamped behind him. The siege was long and bloody, more especially the action by which the duke of Vendosme cut off the communication between the army and the town. At length, however, after fifty-two days open trenches, the capitulation was signed on the 10th of August<sup>i</sup>. In Flanders the important fortrefs of Ath was taken by the marshal Catinat, which, with the news of the loss of *Carthagen*a in the West Indies, besieged, reduced, and plundered, by the sieur Pontis, and ransacked again by the buccaniers, brought the ministers at Madrid to see clearly, that they must accept of those terms which their allies thought reasonable, and to oblige them to accept of which, at least as they surmised, they had given them little or no assistance<sup>k</sup>. Accordingly, proper orders being dispatched to Don Bernard de Quiros, the treaty was signed at the castle of Ryswick, on the 20th of September<sup>l</sup>, by which all that had been taken from them in Catalonia, the important fortrefs of Luxemburgh, the county of Chinesi, the fortresses of historiques & chronologiques.

<sup>i</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, 1697.

<sup>l</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. BURNET's History of his own Times, LIMIERS, LARREY, P. DANIEL, Histoire de France.

<sup>k</sup> QUINCY, Memoires
<sup>l</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 408. Actes, Memoires, & Negotiations, de la Paix de Ryswick.

Charlroi, Mons, Ath, Courtrai, and all that had been torn from them by the chambers of reunion, were restored. The peace was solemnly proclaimed at Madrid; and the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, in consideration of the gallant defence of Barcelona, was not only created grandee of Spain, and adorned with the order of the Golden Fleece, but declared likewise viceroy and captain general of Catalonia<sup>m</sup>.

In most countries, and in Spain almost beyond any coun- The court
try, such favours conferred upon a foreigner are apt to torn by create envy and discontent; but if these preferments and  factions honours produced, as certainly they did, some effects of this and in- fort, they were strangely strengthened and encouraged by trigues, the king's making him a present of 50,000 pistoles, which while the
was followed by rich gifts from the queen, and very ex- king's pensive compliments of the same kind from all the grandees, health who were desirous of acquiring or preserving her favour. daily de- clines.

These unpopular strokes, however, were followed by another still more so than any or than all the rest. A regiment of horse-guards was formed mostly out of the inferior officers of the disbanded cavalry, of which the prince himself was colonel, and named all the other officers, and which, as soon as it was formed, was sent to Toledo: this gave very great offence, more especially as this new regiment was established when most of the national corps were discharged; but the queen minded this very little, pursuing her interests, or rather her inclinations, with very remarkable vivacity. The cardinal archbishop of Toledo, better known to the world by the title of cardinal Portocarrero, gave her no small opposition; and, according as their respective credits prevailed, various successive changes took place<sup>n</sup>. At this time the queen had an apparent superiority, as appeared from the count de Monterey's being forbidden the court for the freedom with which he expressed himself in council, and the raising count d'Oropesa to the high dignity of president of Castile. The king's health continued all this time very precarious; he was subject to fainting fits, to fluxes, and sometimes his hands and legs swelled. The physicians advised a change of air; upon which their majesties made a tour to the city of Toledo, where, under the care of an English gentleman, one doctor Somers, bred at Oxford, the king grew much better, and, by the use of gentle exercise, recovered his strength<sup>o</sup>. On the return of the court to Ma-

1698.

<sup>m</sup> Mercuré historique & politique.
gociations secretes du Comte de HARRAC.
historique & politique, 1698.

<sup>n</sup> Memoires & Ne- • Mercuré

drid, the ministerial intrigues revived. Count Harrach, the imperial minister, had a great influence over the king, and a greater over the queen; but the marquis de Harcourt, who was sent from France immediately after the conclusion of the peace, had likewise a considerable degree of favour; and the marchioness his wife behaved with so much respect to all the Spanish ladies, made them so many presents, and took such pains to render herself popular, that, in the space of a few months, it was surprising to see the progress that was made in raising and augmenting a party. Amongst other arts, the marquis exhibited in the hall of his palace the pictures of the dauphin and of his three sons, the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and care was taken to point out their resemblance to the infanta Donna Maria Theresa, whose memory was very dear to all the old Spaniards. Besides, the marquis neglected nothing to insinuate himself into the good graces of the clergy; and, being informed by them of many families of old officers that were in distress, he relieved them liberally and secretly. He likewise offered his catholic majesty a squadron for the relief of Ceuta, which was again besieged; and, in respect to some differences that arose upon the frontiers, after great pains taken to fix the fault upon the Spaniards, all was left to his catholic majesty's discretion, and no demands of satisfaction were made, as in former times P.

Makes a will in favour of the prince of Bavaria, declared his heir by the first treaty of partition.

THE precautions taken for settling the succession to the crown of Spain, in case his catholic majesty should die without heirs, of which there was a strong appearance, on the part of that monarch himself, as well as of his allies, comprehend some of the most curious and interesting points of modern history; and though they have been so often, and in all appearance so exactly, stated, yet, as we have taken the pains to examine them very closely and minutely, and to separate, as well as possible, not only facts from falsehoods, but from conjectures, we have reason to flatter ourselves, that what we shall deliver on this head, as succinctly as it is possible, will afford the reader some satisfaction. The first treaty of partition was negotiated this summer between king William and Louis XIV. with very great secrecy, and at length concluded and signed at the Hague<sup>q</sup>, on the 11th of October; on the part of his most Christian majesty, by the count Tallard; by the earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson, on the part of his Britannic majesty; and by eight

P Memoires & Negociations secretes du Comte de HARRACH.
q Corps Diplomatique, tom. vii. Part ii. p. 442.

plenipotentiaries for the states general. The ratifications were dated the 24th of the same month. By this treaty the electoral prince of Bavaria was to enjoy Spain and the Indies; the dauphin the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, with the places on the coast of Tuscany, the town and marquisate of Finat, the province of Guipuscoa, including the towns of Fontarabia, St. Sebastian, and Port Passage; and the archduke Charles was to have the duchy of Milan. Some writers say*, that, in resentment of this treaty, and to prevent his dominions from being dismembered, his catholic majesty resolved to make a will in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, and to declare him his heir general of all his territories in Europe and the Indies. Some writers again<sup>s</sup> speak doubtfully of this will, and seem to think that nothing can or ought to be affirmed with certainty about it. Both are mistaken; for it was not the partition treaty that gave occasion to this will, and there is not the least reason to hesitate as to the point of fact that such a will there really was. There had been long a disposition in the king, at the instance of the queen, and some of the ministers, to favour the archduke Charles; but it was thought requisite, as a previous measure, that the emperor should send ten thousand men into his catholic majesty's dominions, that there might be a force sufficient to support whatever declaration the king should make. But the emperor Leopold deferred this so long on account of his war with the Turks, and other motives, some of which were concealed, and some assigned, and the bishop of Lerida<sup>t</sup>, his catholic majesty's minister at Vienna, sent such strange relations of the contempt expressed for the Spanish nation at Vienna, that, the patience of the king Don Carlos being quite worn out, he at length determined to make, and actually did make, a will, in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, which was intirely conformable to the disposition of his father Philip the fourth, and to the renunciations upon which that disposition was founded. It is necessary to observe, that the only colour of objection to which this young prince's title was liable, was, the renunciation made by his mother the archduchess Maria Antonietta, upon her marriage with the elector of Bavaria; but the most able lawyers unanimously agreed, that this renunciation was null and void, as not having been communicated.

* Histoire de Louis XIV. par MARTINIERRE, tom. v. p. 198, 199.

<sup>s</sup> Abregé de l'Histoire de France, par le President HENAUT, p. 669.

<sup>t</sup> Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, tom. i. p. 320.

to the court, and not having had the sanction of the Cortes, or states of Spain <sup>u</sup>; an inquiry and resolution attended with extraordinary consequences.

The death
of the prince of Bavaria
turns things back into the former
state of perplexity.
1699.

AT the opening of this year, the testament in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria being made at the close of the last, of which the marquis de Harcourt having received intelligence from cardinal Portocarrero, had given early notice in France, that minister received orders to present a memorial to his catholic majesty upon this head; which we find represented in some collections of state papers as a very secret transaction, and as inconsistent with his most Christian majesty's engagements with his Britannic majesty and the states. It was neither; for it was so public, that it appeared in the common gazettes at that time; and all that is said therein amounts to no more than this, that, considering the harmony subsisting between the two courts, it was with great surprize he learned, in a manner that would not allow him to doubt of the fact, that his catholic majesty had made a testament in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria: that it was fit his majesty should know the most Christian king could not but be attentive to the indubitable rights of his only son the dauphin; and that it was requisite to put his majesty in mind, that the most Christian king, as well out of tenderness as decency, had never troubled him before even with the most distant hint on this delicate subject. This produced a civil, but a general answer, importing, his catholic majesty's attention to the peace and welfare of his subjects should be ever accompanied with a strict regard to what was due to the relation and friendship subsisting between the two monarchs <sup>w</sup>. In the mean time the young prince, whom the king and whom the allies had destined for his successor, died on the 6th of February, of a short illness at Brussels, attended with some suspicions that received perhaps too much credit from what was some years after thrown out by the elector of Bavaria, in a manifesto which he published, and which amounts to no more than a proof of his opinion <sup>x</sup>. This unexpected death, however, altered the state of things every-where; for, though it was provided against in a secret article of the partition treaty, in which it was stipulated,

<sup>u</sup> Memoires du Comte de HARRACH, tom. ii. p. 124. 302.

<sup>w</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siècle xviii. tom. i. pag. 96. Mercurius historicus & politicus, A. D. 1699.

<sup>x</sup> Histoire des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, par LE CLERC. BURNET's History of his own Times, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

that,

that, in such a case, the elector might be substituted in the place of his son, yet, upon mature deliberation, it was judged more expedient to have recourse to a new treaty. In Spain the king was advised by his ministers to make a new will, and to take the sense of the pope, which has ever the greatest weight in that country as to the validity of renunciations, in prejudice to the established rule of succession, which proved a work of time, the result of which will appear in its proper place.

THERE happened about the close of the month of April, King at Madrid, a violent sedition, in which almost all the meaner sort of people were engaged, the cause of which was the scarcity of bread, and the dearness of all sorts of provisions. The populace demolished the house of the count d'Oropesa, and had murdered him and his family, if they had not found means to escape in disguise. By the express interposition of the king's authority, and not without much difficulty, it was appeased; upon a strict inquiry, it was found, that the source of this mischief was a new tax, the produce of which was shared by the count d'Oropesa, the amirante of Castile, and the countess of Berlipsis, the queen's favourite. Upon this, the king pardoned all who had been imprisoned, moved the count d'Oropesa from being president of Castile, and banished both him and the amirante; and the cardinal of Toledo, with other ministers, who had been for some time out of favour, were recalled and caressed<sup>1</sup>. At the proper season of the year the court went to the Escorial, where the king went to visit the Pantheon, and ordered the coffins of his mother and first queen to be opened. Of the former there was nothing left intire but one hand, which the king stooped down, and kissed with tears. The body of the latter remained not only whole, but the colour of the face remained unchanged; which surprised the king so much, that he immediately retired. There have been various speculations upon this incident; but the foregoing part of our history will shew, that this was no very unusual thing, and his father Philip the fourth had done the very same in the year 1655, when it was observed, that the body of Charles the fifth appeared more fresh than that of his own queen Elizabeth, who died but nine years before<sup>2</sup>. At the return of the court from the Escorial, the king having granted a visits the tombs, and opens the coffins, of his deceased mother and wife.

<sup>1</sup> Mercuré historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>2</sup> Les Delices de l'Espagne & du Portugal, par Don JUAN ALVAREZ DE COLMENAR, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

pension, on the revenues of the Low Countries, to the counts of Berlips, the count de Monterey, who was president of the council of Flanders, not only opposed it, but inveighed so bitterly against what he called the German government, that he received orders from the king to retire from Madrid in forty-eight hours; upon which a new commotion ensued, and the people, in the king's hearing, cried out; Let the patriots be recalled, and the plunderers banished <sup>a</sup>!

Resents highly the conduct of Great Britain and Holland,
as to the partition
treaty.

WHILE the allies were intent upon their new treaty of partition, the count de Canales, the Spanish minister at London, presented a memorial to the regency, the king being then in Holland, conceived in very strong terms, and in which some gross epithets were used with respect to the first treaty. Upon the transmitting of this paper, dated the third of May, to the king at Loo, Mr. secretary Vernon was directed to wait upon the Spanish ambassador, with an order to quit the kingdom in eighteen days, which he accordingly did. On this news arriving at Madrid, Mr. Stanbope, the British minister, received the like orders; to which he answered, that he needed not so much time, having received his master's commands to the like purpose some days before <sup>b</sup>. This did not however hinder the allies from concluding their second treaty, by which Spain and the Indies were given to the archduke Charles, the duchy of Lorraine was added to the countries assigned the dauphin, in exchange for which duke Leopold of Lorraine was to have the duchy of Milan. The emperor was to signify his consent in three months; and in case the duke of Lorraine would not accept of Milan, it was to be given to the elector of Bavaria; or to the duke of Savoy: in the first case, the dauphin was to have Navarre; and in the latter, the duchy of Savoy and the county of Nice. This second treaty of partition was signed at London, by the French and English ministers, on the 3d of March 1700, N. S.; and at the Hague, on the 25th of the same month, by the plenipotentiaries for the states <sup>c</sup>. In the month of August the emperor, by count Harrach, declared to the ministers of France and Holland, and afterwards to the secretary of the English embassy, that he conceived himself to have the sole and indubitable right of succession to the whole of the Spanish monarchy; and that, if his line should fail, that succession belonged to the house of Savoy by the testament of Philip the fourth. At the same time, however, that this declaration was made, his imperial majesty desired that they would not proceed to name another prince in consequence of his refusal, pursuant to one of the articles of the treaty, in case he did not accept it in three months, and which, by a secret article, was extended to five months; and in this situation things rested, at least on the part of the allies, and their differences with the court of Madrid were not long after amicably compromised, and their usual intercourse restored; though through the minister of Holland only, neither of the kings being inclined to recede first, but rather to allow time to act, as he often does, as the mediator between them <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne. & politique.

<sup>b</sup> Mercure historique

<sup>c</sup> Corps Diplomatique, tom. vii. P. ii. p. 477. BURNET's History of his own Times, & auct. supra citat.

As there were many points, in regard to the frontiers in Strange the Low Countries, left undecided between the two crowns, d'fraction commissioners were appointed to meet at Lisle, by their ca- and confutholic and most Christian majesties, who in an amicable map- sion aner settled every thing, and subscribed a treaty or conven- mongst the tion upon this subject towards the close of the foregoing ministers, year; and the ratifications were exchanged in the b and in the
of this, with great candour and civility on both side court of proceeded from the situation that things were in, Madrid.
king's tenderness for the welfare of his subjects*.
heart he was as much attached to his family as ev
therefore he appointed Don Francisco de Moles, duke de Pa- reta, his ambassador to the court of Vienna, with the warmest assurances of that nature; from whence a report afterwards prevailed in the world, that this Neapolitan nobleman carried with him a will in favour of the archduke. Not long 1700;
after, one father Moro, who came from Turin, put the whole court in confusion, by pretending to discover that his majesty was bewitched, and that his ill health was owing to charms and practices with evil spirits; and it seems that at first, as foolish as these tales were, they met with credit, since this monk was permitted to exorcise the king, for which,
as he was not at all the better, the tables were turned upon the exorcist, so that he fell into the hands of the inquisition.
Father Dias, the king's confessor, who ran, or pretended to run, into the same wild notions, and took the liberty from thence of speaking very injuriously of persons of the highest rank, was not only disgraced, but banished, and sent pri-

* Memoires du Comte d'HARRACH, tom. i. Histoire gene- rale d'Espagne, History of Europe, A. D. 1700. * Mer- cure historique et politique, A. D. 1700. Corps Universel Di- plomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. P. ii. p. 470.

soner to his cloister. The marquis de Harcourt, who was grown weary of a court where there was so much discord and confusion, had his audience of leave in May, and soon after returned to France, having first introduced Mr. Ble-court, who was appointed envoy on his departure <sup>f</sup>.

The violence of the king's disease much exasperated by chagrin and despair.

ALL possible methods had been tried by the queen, and those in her favour, to prevent the countess of Berlips from being sent back to Germany; but the public clamour became so strong, and some of the principal ministers represented to the king, in such plain terms, the mischiefs occasioned, that she was at length dismissed, with her son, her niece, and most of the German servants the queen had brought with her, but with great civility, and many rich presents <sup>g</sup>. About the same time some endeavours were used to procure a general assembly of the states, in order to take their advice in regulating the succession; but this went no farther than a rumour. The king's health remained very precarious; he was sometimes seized with vomitings, and other evacuations, that threatened him with immediate death; notwithstanding which he recovered, and for some short space of time seemed tolerably well. In these intervals he went so often in procession, took so much exercise, and appeared so frequently in public, that the people might conceive the better of his health, as, in the opinion of his physicians, contributed not a little to those frequent relapses <sup>h</sup>. The French minister, and the minister from the states, having each of them communicated, by a memorial, the conclusion of the second treaty of partition; it threw his catholic majesty into a deep melancholy, who thereupon demanded from the emperor the archduke Charles, desiring he might be sent privately into Spain; and proposing that an indisposition should be feigned, to prevent his departure from being discovered as long as possible. To this he received no immediate answer; so that the delays of that court, the memorials of the allies, the misunderstandings amongst his own ministers, leaving him no quiet, and no creature to whom he could express himself in confidence, the poor king often traversed his apartments, hastily wringing his hands like one in despair, and was overheard to say to himself, Where is my Son! where is Charles! where is the archduke! At length, understanding, that, under pretence of care for that young prince's health, the emperor had actually refused to send him, he lost all patience and power over himself. At this juncture the French minister presented a menacing memorial, which, added to the load of his former afflictions, brought on, about the middle of September, such a violent fit of his distemper, that he received the sacraments of the church; but, to the amazement of those about him, and even of his physicians, he not only escaped, but seemed to recover strength<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, Memoires du Comte d'HARRACH. <sup>g</sup> Mercure historique & politique. <sup>h</sup> Memoires du Comte d'HARRACH.

WHEN he grew a little better, cardinal Portocarrero represented to him the necessity of his fixing the succession by a will; that the secret congregation at Rome, to whom the pope had referred the renunciations of his aunt and of his sister, had declared them null; that the motive of those renunciations, which was preventing the junction of the crowns of France and Spain, might be complied with, and at the same time the dismembering of his dominions prevented, by calling Philip duke of Anjou to the succession. Upon this, the king fixed his eyes earnestly on the cardinal, who stood by his bed-side; bid him weigh the matter attentively, and remember that he discharged the whole burden of it upon him, who must be responsible at the last day for his conduct in this important affair. Upon this the cardinal caused the will to be drawn, which the king, not without great reluctance, signed, on the 2d of October following; and, having sealed it up, caused it to be put in a cover before some of the principal nobility, who thereupon indorsed their names as witnesses, viz. the cardinals Portocarrero and Borgia, Don Manuel de Arias, president of Castile, the duke of Medina Sidonia, count de Benevente, and the dukes of Sessa and Infantado. Three days after he made a codicil, by which he confirmed his testament, and added some pious legacies, directing that the queen should have the government either of the Italian provinces, or of the Low Countries, at her own choice<sup>k</sup>. Notwithstanding all this, he wrote to the duke of Pareta, to acquaint him with his testament; and ordered him to inform the emperor, that, notwithstanding the low state of his affairs and his health had obliged him to take this step, yet he hoped to live long enough to make another disposition in favour of his imperial majesty, without prejudice to the welfare of his subjects. He had indeed some reason to hope this; for he grew afterwards so much better, that public rejoicings were made at Madrid and at Brussels. On the 26th of October he relapsed for the last time with such mortal symptoms, that he immediately received the sacraments with great resignation, as he likewise did with the same disposition three days afterwards; and on the first of November, between two and three in the afternoon, he breathed his last, being within five days of thirty-nine years old, and having reigned a little more than thirty-five years<sup>1</sup>.

At the instigation of cardinal Portocarrero, makes a will in favour of the duke of Anjou.

<sup>1</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Hist. du Siecle xviii. tom. i. p. 110. Mercurie historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>k</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. vii. P. ii. p. 485. Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. ii. p. 64. 109.

The will,
after some deliberation, accepted by Louis
XIV. and the dauphin.

THE late king's testament was opened the very same day that he died; upon which the queen dowager, cardinal Perotocarrero, the president of Castile, the inquisitor-general, the count de Frigliano, counsellor of state, and the count de Benevente, grandee of Spain, in quality of regents of the kingdom, notified to the minister of France the nomination of the duke of Anjou. The minister dispatched an account of this, with an extract of the testament, to the court of France. The queen, and the rest of the regents, wrote also the same day to the most Christian king; and, after this, dispatched a second and a third letter, to press the immediate departure of their new king, and to represent the difficulties they laboured under, till they received at least the news of his acceptance of the crown. On the 12th of the same month Louis XIV. notified to them, by a letter under his own hand, that the duke of Anjou had accepted the crown, and that the dauphin had renounced all his pretensions in his favour<sup>m</sup>. It may not be amiss to observe, that some historians have asserted they were for a time divided at the court of Spain as to the choice of a successor out of the house of Bourbon, some of the ministers being inclined to prefer the duke of Orleans, or his son the duke of Chartres; and it has been also insinuated, that this would not have been disagreeable to Louis XIV.; but that, after mature deliberation, this project was laid aside, from an apprehension that his most Christian majesty would be less zealous in the cause of his nephew than in that of his grandson. At first sight this seems very plausible; but a little reflection will shew, that it is far from being solid, since the Spanish ministers might have reasonably concluded, that the want of zeal in the French king might have been balanced by the want of inclination in other princes to have disputed that nomination, which would have quadrated so well with the pacific views of the allies. But, to speak the truth without reserve, this is not in the least degree probable; for, if the ministers had ever reflected upon this matter at all, they would never have omitted the duke of Orleans and his whole line, in the disposition of the Spanish monarchy made by this testament, as it is evident they did. It was for this reason that Philip duke of Orleans, on behalf of himself and his son, made at Paris a solemn protest against the validity of this will, with respect to the preference given to the archduke Charles, in prejudice to the duke and his family, more especially as that testament is founded solely on the inviolable rule of succession to the Spanish monarchy". This protest is dated the 1st of December, and on the 4th of the same month the new king set out for his dominions; which naturally brings us to the close of this section, and to the detail of a transaction, one of the most material in modern history, which was immediately the source of a long war, which, at the bottom, has been the cause of every war since, and which it is very possible may prove the ground of disputes that are yet to come.

<sup>1</sup> BURNET'S History of his own Times, Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. ii. p. 133. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. <sup>m</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. ii. p. 147. LARREY, Histoire de Louis XIV. LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle XVIII. tom. i. p. 229—235. History of Europe, A. D. 1700.

• Mercure historique & politique.

S E C T. XVII.

The Reign of Philip V. from his Accession, to the Treaty of Utrecht.

WE had, in the foregoing sections, for the most part, Plan of guides sufficiently known, and whose historical labours this sec- have received the sanction of public approbation; but we tion, with can boast no longer of this advantage. What we are to de- a view of liver in this section is a new history, collected from the best the method materials that we could meet with, and carefully com- in which, pared, and methodically digested. For these reasons we and autho- thought it necessary to be a little more full, that the reader rities on may receive greater satisfaction in regard to a period, where which, it we cannot atone for our succinctness, as we have hitherto is written. done, by referring him to some larger history, as well as from the consideration that what falls near our own times, and within the remembrance of many who are now living, becomes so much the more interesting, and is for that reason read with greater curiosity, and examined with more attention. But, that we might still keep within reasonable bounds, we touch as slightly as possible whatever regards transactions out of Spain, though relative to that crown, leaving them to be more accurately explained in their proper places, and admitting few or no events which are not of real importance, or which are not absolutely necessary to the understanding such as are; so that, in the course of the section, there may be represented the real consequences of the duke of Anjou's being called to this succession, the disposition of the Spaniards towards him, the source of those discontents, that induced whole provinces to embrace the interest of his competitor, the progress of the war, and the means by which he came at last to be left in the quiet possession of Spain and the Indies, after an obstinate and bloody dispute, which was calculated to deprive him of both.

Measures
taken by the regents
to facilitate the quiet accession of Philip.

THE regents having fixed the 24th of November for the proclamation of the new king, the ceremony was performed with all possible regularity and splendor, and with loud acclamations of joy by the populace<sup>a</sup>. The regents, knowing well how bold a step they had taken, resolved to proceed in the same road, and with the same vigour. They desired the marquis of Harcourt, now honoured with the title of duke and peer, to take his seat in the council; and, in their answer to his most Christian majesty's letter, they desired him to take what measures he thought proper on the behalf of Spain, and assured him of their approbation, as also that they had given instructions to the viceroys of provinces, and governors of places, to obey his orders, and to march or to receive whatever troops he should judge requisite<sup>b</sup>. The dukes of Burgundy and Berry attended Philip to the frontiers, and took their leaves of him in the Isle of Pheasants. The king slept that night at Irun, which was the 24th of January, where he was received by the bishop of Pampeluna, and other persons of distinction<sup>c</sup>. His first act of sovereignty was bestowing the viceroyalty of Catalonia upon the count de Palma, nephew to cardinal Portacarrero, notwithstanding the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, who was in possession of that dignity, had owned him as well as the rest of the Spanish viceroys; such as the elector of Bavaria in the Low Countries, prince Vaudemont in the duchy of Milan, and the duke de Medina Cœli at Naples. But, in the midst of all

<sup>a</sup> Hist. gen. d'Espagne, Memoires & Negociations secretes de diverses Cours de l'Europe, tom. ii. p. 188.

<sup>b</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. i. p. 233.

Memoires & Negociations secretes de diverses Cours de l'Europe, tom. ii. p. 197.

<sup>c</sup> History of Europe for 1700. BUR-NARD's History of his own Times, Mercure historique & politique, this seeming tranquillity, as there was a league forming abroad, so there were contrivances at home to deprive him of that crown which he had so lately received.

To give the better colour to this, the count de Harrach, Contrivances of those who were still attached to the house of Austria. 1701.
on the 17th of January, protested, in the most solemn manner, at Madrid, against the validity of the late king's will, which he alleged that monarch had no power to make. Father Torres, who had been his confessor, asserted, that a little before his death he had declared to him and to the inquisitor-general, that what he did was against his inclination. The queen-dowager likewise was disposed to the same way of thinking; of which king Philip being informed, he wrote her a letter with his own hand, desiring her to quit the capital, and go to Valencia, Granada, or Cordova; but, as the season was very cold, she chose to go no further than Toledo. The regents intimated to Bernard de Mendoza, bishop of Segovia, inquisitor-general, and one of their own number, that his absence would be acceptable; and as for the confessor, they banished him without ceremony. They removed likewise some other persons, and even the imperial and palatine ministers, who made at first some difficulty of obeying; but the regents having observed to them, that they could not insist on their public characters to a prince they would not acknowledge, and that they could not be responsible for the safety of their persons, they thought fit to take the advice that was given them. King Philip arrived on the 18th of February at the palace of Buen Retiro, where he was received by cardinal Portocarrero, and many of the grantees, and where he resided till the 14th of April, when, all things being ready, he made his public entry into Madrid with all possible magnificence, and attended by such a croud of people, that some were pressed to death in the streets. His youth, his docility, the sweetness of his temper, his clemency, and, above all, his piety, gained him the affections of the nobility in appearance, and of the middle and meaner sort of people in reality.

THE court of France, desirous of securing the duke of Philip Savoy in the interest of the two crowns, after the refusal, as unanimously some say, of an archduchess, demanded the younger daughter of that prince, Donna Louisa Gabriella, sister to the dumously acknowledged

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. iii. p. 24. LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. j. p. 367.

<sup>e</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1701. <sup>f</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>g</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. iii. p. 33. Histoire chronologique, History of Europe for 1701. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

and received by the provinces of Spain.

chefs of Burgundy, to which the duke very readily agreed. This marriage was declared at Madrid on the 4th of May, without asking the opinion or consent of the council, at which some took offence. But public rejoicings were made, and the marriage went on. It was afterwards hastily solemnized at the court of Savoy, immediately after which the young princess was sent to Nice, from whence she proceeded by sea to Marseilles, where after being entertained in the most superb manner, she proceeded to Barcelona, to which city the king, upon the notice of her departure, immediately set out from Madrid<sup>b</sup>. Before he left his capital, he received the homage of the grandees of Castile, who, according to the old custom, not only swore to serve him with duty and affection, but likewise to disclose whatever designs against him should come to their knowledge, and to fight against the enemies of his government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. He also made a tour, in the month of August, to Toledo, in order to visit the queen dowager, who received him with all possible marks of kindness and respect, made him a present of a golden fleece richly adorned with jewels, which she fastened with her own hands to his button, and received from him an eagle enriched with diamonds of great price<sup>i</sup>. All the provinces of Spain made him a free gift upon his accession, and, amongst the rest, that of Guipuscoa, which had never shewn the like mark of zeal for any of his predecessors. He named, on his leaving Madrid, a cabinet council, at the head of which was cardinal Portocarrera, made a public entry into the city of Saragossa, in his way to Catalonia, and, arriving at Barcelona, held an assembly of the states there in the month of October, where he gave a specimen of his wisdom and goodness, which induced the people for a time to consider him as another Solomon (A).

There

<sup>b</sup> Mercure historique & politique, Histoire general d'Espagne.

<sup>i</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

(A) The case alluded to in the text regards the son of the duke de Medina Sidonia, the first duke in Castil, grandee of Spain of the first class, master of the horse to the king, and one of the gravest, worthiest, and most potent, noblemen in Spain. This young gentleman, being displeased that an officer of the revenue presumed to search his equipage at the entrance of Madrid, gave him some coarse language; to which, either not knowing or not regarding his quality, the fellow answered with all the insolence of a man in office; which so provoked the young lord, that he shot him through the head. For this

There his marriage was celebrated with great lustre; and there, in consequence of his grandfather's advice, which was likewise approved by his own council, he resolved to pass over into Italy, where the war was already begun, and where his presence was on that and on many other accounts become absolutely necessary<sup>k</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> Histoire gen. d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique.

high offence cardinal Portocarrero caused him to be closely confined, and dispatched an express immediately to Barcelona, with an account of what had happened, to the king, as being unwilling to run any hazard of offending the grandees, by taking any steps, in an affair of so delicate a nature, of his own head. As soon as Philip had received and read the cardinal's dispatch, he called the duke of Medina Sidonia into his cabinet: "There is a young man," said the king, "the son of a person of very high quality, who has killed an officer of the revenue for doing his duty, and while he was doing it; I desire you would give me your opinion, how he ought to be punished for this offence?" The duke, after a little consideration, made answer, that the offence was of a very high nature; that the young man, let him be whose son he would, should be confined for the remainder of his life in prison; and his father obliged to provide for the widow of the deceased, and for all his family. "You have spoke," returned Philip, "upon this occasion, like a king, and therefore I must speak to you as a father. The criminal is your son;

"send him to one of your own castles, and keep him there till he is made thoroughly sensible of his fault; with respect to the widow and family of the deceased, I cannot dispense with that part of your judgment, and I am persuaded you will make no difficulty in assigning them a handsome maintenance."

The duke threw himself at the king's feet, to thank him for this act of favour and kindness, and remained always attached to him with the most heroic fidelity (1). An instance he gave of this when the affairs of Philip were in a very critical situation, that is, after raising the siege of Barcelona, when he was obliged to retire into France, and it was debated in his council whether he should not remain there. The duke, who was then very old, and also infirm, said, at the close of the debate, "His majesty will determine, from what he has heard, whether he will go; for my part, I have long ago determined to follow him to the last gasp of my breath, and into the most distant corner of the world" (2). But, as the reader will see, things did not come to such extremities.

(1) Mercure historique & politique, tom. xxxi. p. 579. Causes celebres & interessantes, tom. viii. p. 521. (2) Voyage, Etat present de l'Espagne, tom. iv. p. 172.

His foreign alliances with Portugal and Savoy, and his marriage with a princess of the last-mentioned house.

As to foreign affairs, the interests of Spain were now entirely managed by the most Christian king, who shewed great wisdom and spirit in the contrivance; but, having outlived the great ministers and heroes who had contributed to the elevation of his glory, failed in the execution of them. If he really outwitted the allies, in preferring the spirit to the letter of the partition treaty, they were certainly even with him by their persevering in such a conduct as hindered him from discerning with certainty whether they intended peace or war. King William and the states of Holland acknowledged king Philip upon his accession; and the latter, by this act of civility, recovered 22 battalions of old troops dispersed in the garrisons of the Low Countries. Yet, in the beginning of the month of September, the grand alliance was signed<sup>1</sup>, which perhaps might have been prevented, if France had made the same vigorous use of her arms she had formerly done. An alliance offensive and defensive was also concluded, by the two crowns, with the duke of Savoy<sup>m</sup>, in consequence of which, and the marriage of his daughter, he was declared generalissimo of their forces in Italy, where, as marshal Catinat suspected, he exposed his person with great intrepidity on one side, while he furnished to, as well as held secret intelligence with, the other<sup>n</sup>. An alliance of the like kind was made with the court of Portugal; and his most Christian majesty, amongst other things, undertook to pay the dowry of the queen dowager of England, in case it should, out of resentment of this treaty, be stopped by that crown<sup>o</sup>. Both these alliances, though advantageous in shew, proved detrimental in fact to France and Spain, where they depended upon, and were deceived by, them. The pope was in the interest of king Philip, and yet had not the courage to grant him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples. An insurrection happened in that capital, which was extinguished indeed, but not without effusion of blood, as well in the streets as on the scaffold<sup>p</sup>; so that at the end of this year affairs had a very cloudy aspect at home and abroad, and the young king found himself obliged to quit his consort almost as soon as he had received her, and the kingdoms of which he had just taken possession, to go and expose his person in provinces where a spirit of disaffection had already appeared, and at the head of armies which had already suffered several checks, and where he was to rely intirely upon the conduct of others, having as yet no military experience, and being too young to form any just notions of men or things, at least in proportion to the exigency of his affairs, and that critical conjuncture in which he was called to the government of a nation, distracted in their councils, divided in their affections, and, in point of treasure and power, almost totally exhausted. It is true, that, towards the close of the year, he had the consolation of seeing the plate fleet arrive with a cargo of sixty millions; and was so prudent as to refuse admission to the fleet of the allies, which, without committing hostilities, had demanded entrance into the port of Cadiz, with an intention to seize it.

<sup>1</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. viii. P. i. p. 83. Memoires historiques & chronologique, Le CLERC, QUINCY, LIMIER. <sup>m</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. <sup>n</sup> Mercure historique & politique. <sup>o</sup> Corps Diplomatique, t. m. viii. P. i. pag. 31. QUINCY, Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. iii. p. 504. <sup>p</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

THE intended voyage of king Philip into Italy was by King Philip no means agreeable to many of the Spanish lords, and it was likewise disapproved by the duke of Harcourt. His grand-father sent him a long memorial upon the subject, by the count de Marfin; but as he remained fixed to his purpose, after the perusal of that paper, his most Christian majesty consented, and complimented him by a letter upon that firmness<sup>1</sup>. In the mean time there were many things of importance to be settled; the states of Catalonia made high demands, and took very little notice of those made by the king. Both their majesties were much indisposed during their residence at Barcelona; and the news they received from Madrid, as well as from most other quarters, was far from being agreeable. At length the king yielded to all the demands of the Catalans; and, in return, they granted him a million, to be paid in ten years, and 50,000 crowns by way of free gift to the queen<sup>2</sup>. The marquis de Bedmar, was appointed commander in chief of the Low Countries, on the departure of the elector of Bavaria for his own dominions; and, at the pressing instances of cardinal Portocarrero, the king consented that the queen should remain in Spain, and that the councils of regency should be held in her presence<sup>3</sup>.

a tour to Italy, contrary to the sentiments of the Spanish nobility.

1702.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, BURNET'S History of his own Times.

<sup>2</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1702.

LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. ii. p. 2, 3. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>3</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

<sup>4</sup> LE CLERC, Histoire des Pro- vinces Unies des Pays Bas.

*Pacifies Naples by his presence, and secures the Sicilians
without making them a visit.*

ALL things being at length adjusted in the best manner possible, the king embarked at Barcelona on the 8th of April, and landed the 15th of the same month in the bay of Naples. He made his entry into that city the next day, where his presence seemed to re-establish a calm. He was not only very affable to the nobility, but granted audiences to all sorts of people, heard their grievances patiently, and redressed them as far as he was able. There was an arrear of about five or six millions due to the crown for quit-rents and taxes, which lay very heavy, and afforded the officers of the revenue constant colour for vexations. King Philip made a short end of this; he remitted the whole; at which the people were so distracted with joy, that, when the nobility made him a free gift of three hundred thousand ducats, the commons of Naples gave him four hundred thousand <sup>u</sup>. He would have crossed the sea to Sicily; but it was represented to him, that the severity of the Spanish government, since the revolt of Messina, had not only spread universal discontent through that island, but had impoverished the nobility and gentry to such a degree, that the expence of a royal visit would absolutely ruin them. He not only desisted, upon this, from his design, but sent his orders to that kingdom for restoring the honours and estates to all that had been condemned and banished, and directed their palaces, that had been demolished, to be rebuilt at his expence; which effectually gained him the hearts of that nation, as appeared afterwards in many instances <sup>w</sup>. At his leaving Naples, he granted an amnesty to all who had been concerned in the late troubles; which had not the same effect, though it created a great joy for the present.

*Proceeds to the duchy
of Milan,
joins the duke of Ven-
dome,
and fights
the battle of Luzara.*

HE quitted that capital on the 2d of June, went by sea to Leghorn, and proceeded from thence by land to Milan, where he arrived on the 18th of the same month. He went from thence to the army, and intended an interview with his father-in-law, who avoided it, by pretending some disgust in respect to the ceremonial, to decline taking the command of the army, because he had privately changed sides. The king, having joined the duke of Vendome, was present in the action at Luzara on the 15th of August; the imperialists were commanded by prince Eugene, who was very near surprising and destroying the whole army of the two crowns, and prevented by an accident only. This engagement lasted till one in the morning. King Philip was in the right wing, with the marshal de Crequi, who was killed there. The fire was prodigiously warm; and he gave upon that occasion not only the highest testimonies of personal courage, but of patience also, being near forty-eight hours on horseback, and almost the whole time without any refreshment. Each side sung Te Deum, and claimed the victory; the slaughter was great on both; but in reality the advantage was on the side of the two crowns, for the next day they took Lazara, with all the enemy's magazines; Guaftalla, after a siege of ten days, in which there was a garrison of eighteen hundred men; and soon after Burgoforte, during the siege of which king Philip exposed himself in the trenches, encouraged the soldiers by his liberality, and at length made the garrison, which consisted of four thousand five hundred men, prisoners of war. The campaign being over, the king resolved to return by the way of France into Spain, where his presence was become highly requisite, through that spirit of discontent and intrigue spread throughout the kingdom.

<sup>u</sup> Mercure historique & politique, BURNET'S History of his own Times, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. <sup>w</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

THE queen opened the states of the kingdom of Arragon, and leaving them sitting at Saragossa, proceeded to Madrid, where her arrival created great joy, and prevented that spirit of intrigue, which began to prevail, from breaking out into open insurrection, as otherwise it would have done, upon the appearance of the fleet of the allies before Cadiz &c. As soon as the news came, the queen declared in a council of regency, that she was ready to go into Andalusia, if that could be of any use; and offered all her jewels to be sold, if money was wanting. This had a great effect; cardinal Portecarrero raised and paid six squadrons of horse, the bishop of Cordova levied a regiment of foot at his own expence. The same firmness of the queen appeared after the misfortune at Vigo, where the marine of France was ruined, and where the Spaniards lost, by their own confession, to the value of eight millions of gold. The retreat of the admiral of Castile was a new misfortune; he had accepted the embassy to France, and, under colour of providing every thing requisite to discharge it with the utmost splendor, he raised immense sums of money, packed up a

The queen's spirit and resolution
of great service in a time of public distress.

* QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de Monsieur le Marquis de FEUQUIERES, tom. iii. p. 249. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, BURNET's History of his own Times. 7 Mercure historique et politique, History of Europe for 1702. BURNET, LIMIERS, LARREY. 2 Histoire gen. d'Espagne.

3 Le Siecle de Louis XIV.

vast quantity of rich furniture and jewels, which, at a certain stage upon the road filed off for Portugal, whither he retired himself with great secrecy, and made a kind of public entry into Lisbon, accompanied by about three hundred persons, and one hundred and fifty carriages, on the 23d of October<sup>b</sup>. In the mean time king Philip, having landed at Marseilles, continued his journey with all possible vigilance, and, passing directly into Catalonia, made his entry into Barcelona on the 20th of September; and, from the time of his arrival in Spain, the powers of the regency ceased, and the deliberations of all the councils were transmitted to the king, before any resolutions were taken<sup>c</sup>. All this time cardinal Portocarrero, archbishop of Toledo, was at the head of affairs, and acted in all things as prime minister.

King Philip returns into Spain, and finds great heart-burnings in his conduct.

1703.

ABOUT the middle of January, at the request of cardinal Portocarrero, the king returned to Madrid; the very same day the cardinal d'Etrees came thither likewise with the title of ambassador from his most Christian majesty. This prelate explained to him, pursuant to the intelligence they had received from France, the real intentions of the allies, and the certainty of his being attacked in his own dominions. Upon this king Philip thought proper to enforce the measures already resolved upon for recruiting the Spanish infantry, for remounting their cavalry, and for forming a numerous body of standing forces, under the title of troops of the household. Orders were likewise given in respect to the marine; and, that these necessary projects might be carried into execution with as much vigour as possible, he judged it requisite to make free with six or eight millions of what had been saved out of the galleons at Vigo. The council of the Indies, and the duke of Medina Cœli who was at the head of it, remonstrated very strongly against this proceeding, but in vain. The French cardinal maintained, that a part might be taken to save the whole; and it was believed that the Spaniards were chiefly irritated by the sending immediately two millions into France, to indemnify the most Christian king for the loss of his ships at Vigo, and his subjects in some measure for the loss of their money. The duke de Medina Cœli resigned his employment; the Spanish cardinal quarrelled with the cardinal from France; and the king, to keep them in some measure quiet, was forced to dispatch business without either<sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Mercuré historique & politique.
d'Espagne.

<sup>c</sup> Histoire generale
<sup>d</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, Mer-
curé historique & politique.

UPON this, orders came from France for the duchess of Cardinal Braccaciano, better known by the name of the princess d'Ur-Portocarrero, to return to Rome, on account of her declaring, without any management, for cardinal Portocarrero. She was <sup>the post of</sup> by birth a French woman, of the noble family of Tremouille, <sup>prime mi-</sup> and had gained an unaccountable ascendancy over both their <sup>nister, and</sup> majesties, insomuch that the queen fell sick upon the order, <sup>retires in-</sup> which was thereupon suspended<sup>e</sup>. In secret, both the car- <sup>case of</sup> dinals gave Philip good advice; d'Etrees assured him, that it <sup>Toledo.</sup> was impossible to preserve himself upon the throne, but by the assistance of his grandfather: that, through the weakness of the two last reigns, a spirit of faction had diffused itself amongst the grandees, which inclined many of them to postpone the public in favour of their private interest: that they began already to cabal; and that, without having a sufficient number of French troops upon whom he might rely, neither his crown nor his person could be safe. Cardinal Portocarrero treated these suspicions in general as unjust, but, however, did not oppose the measures that were suggested. He desired the king's leave to resign all his employments, on account of his age and infirmities, but assured him of his constant fidelity and best advice, insinuating, that a state of independency would put it more in his power to serve him, and that he might rely upon his integrity in a private as well as in a public station; but, the king being unwilling to consent, this step was for some time retarded<sup>f</sup>. The commissioners appointed to inquire into the conduct of the admiral declared all his estates forfeited during his life, condemned him to perpetual banishment, and, to justify this sentence, acquitted him of treason; with which the court was not by any means satisfied, apprehending that this would not sufficiently restrain those who still maintained a correspondence with him; and being very well informed of the nature and design of that correspondence, which greatly fortified the credit of that intelligence the French cardinal had given, and augmented the king's fears for what might happen, when the design of the allies came to be disclosed<sup>g</sup>.

AT the time of his retreat, the admiral acted with Admirante great address; he wrote a very respectful letter to the queen, <sup>of Castile's</sup> in which he complained of the injuries done him by his ene- <sup>dangerous</sup> mies, and particularly of the cardinal of Toledo and the pre- <sup>intrigues,</sup> sident of Castile, who had ruined him in the opinion of the <sup>after his</sup> king; and had projected an embassy to France, to force him <sup>retreat into</sup> Portugal.

<sup>e</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.
politique.

<sup>g</sup> Hist. gen. d'Espagne.

<sup>f</sup> Mercure historique &

out of that privacy in which he desired to live : that he had accepted this employment beneath his birth, which was a strange notion, since the constable of Castile was then Philip's ambassador, that he might have an opportunity of getting out of their reach, with which view he retired into Portugal<sup>b</sup>. At the same time he sent back his secretary, with all the papers of the embassy. But these were all appearances ; for at Lisbon he persuaded the ministers of the allies, that, if once the archduke was declared king of Spain, Philip might be with ease dethroned : that the greater part of the nobility, and the people in general, were in the interests of the house of Austria ; and that it was not so much the succours of France, as the irresolution of the court of France, that maintained Philip at Madrid. The king of Portugal having entered into the grand alliance, the admirante drew with his own hand the reasons for sending the archduke into Spain ; which being insisted upon by the allies, at length induced the emperor Leopold, and his son the king of the Romans, to renounce, by a solemn act, dated the eleventh of September, all their pretensions to this monarchy ; in consequence of which, the archduke was the next day publicly declared king of Spain at Vienna, by the name of Charles the third<sup>i</sup>. His correspondence in Spain was certainly great ; and though it was managed with much secrecy, yet Philip and his ministers discovered it in part, and suspected more ; upon which he was at last attainted of treason, and Philip declared, that he would consider as traitors all who had intercourse with him of any kind. About this time the duke of Savoy, who, in the spring of the year, had complained, both at Paris and Madrid, of the calumnies spread to his prejudice, declared openly for the allies, which afflicted the queen extremely<sup>k</sup>. The court of France having recalled the cardinal d'Etrees, cardinal Portocarrero laid hold of that opportunity of executing his former resolution ; and accordingly resigned all his offices, and retired<sup>l</sup>. This afforded a gloomy prospect, though nothing in comparison of what afterwards happened ; for the elector of Bavaria was victorious in Germany, the Low Countries were still preserved, the duke of Vendosme prospered in Italy, and the duke of Savoy

<sup>b</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, 1703. BURNET's History of his own Times. <sup>i</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique tom. viii. P. i. p. 133. History of Europe, for 1703. <sup>k</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par M. VOLTAIRE, LAMBERTI, Memoires, tom. ii. p. 547. <sup>l</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

saw himself in danger of paying, with the loss of his dominions, for deserting the cause of the two crowns.

As king Philip thought it absolutely necessary to have recourse to the succours offered him by his grandfather, and knowing how expedient it would be to have his finances in perfect order at the opening of a war, he gave in to the sentiments of Mr. Orry, who had been sent from France to assist him in matters of this nature, and who, amongst other singular pieces of advice, suggested, that his revenues were but too well collected : that, to prevent the people from defrauding the king of his taxes, and to prevent their own officers from cheating, the Spanish ministers had multiplied them to such a degree, that what the king received was very trifling, in comparison of what was levied ; and that these retainers of the treasury were more numerous, and cost the king a greater sum yearly, than all the effective troops in Spain. Upon this Philip demolished that old fabric, and cashiered the far greater part of these unnecessary officers, which however created a great clamour. This was heightened by suppressing all the titular offices about the court, which were either mere sine-cures, or superfluous. But it was augmented to the highest degree, by obliging some of the old officers of the revenue, who made an improper display of their wealth in times of such confusion, to make some proper offerings out of their abundance, to excuse giving any account how they came by the rest. About the middle of February the duke of Berwick arrived, who was to command the French auxiliaries, and a camp was marked out near Badajoz for 30,000 men. The king repaired thither in the beginning of March, in order to command his forces in person<sup>m</sup>.

King Philip's frugal economy increases the number of the malecontents.

A. D.
1704.

In the mean time Charles III. was arrived in Portugal<sup>n</sup>, where the admiral, not content with owning him, wrote a letter to pope Clement XI. in which he asserted king Charles's will to be a forgery, takes to himself the shame of being concerned in that forgery, and affirms, that there was a true will in favour of Charles III.<sup>o</sup>. The king of Portugal and the new king of Spain published likewise their manifestoes ; and, that he might have an equal share in this paper war, Philip V. published his declaration likewise, by much the most moderate and the best drawn. In this he establishes his right as derived from the fundamental laws of the kingdom ; the testament of his uncle Charles II. made upon mature deliberation ; and the choice of the whole kingdom testified in the most authentic manner. He observes, that he had been four years in possession, and acknowledged by most of the powers of Europe, particularly by the crowns of Great Britain and Portugal, and by the states general, though now embarked in a confederacy to dethrone him. In the close it is added, that if the alliance be increased, it is visibly from motives of interest, certain cessions being made to the king of Portugal out of the territories of Spain, and others to the duke of Savoy out of the Italian dominions. King Philip took likewise this opportunity of bringing his cousin the duke of Orleans's protest upon the carpet ; and established the right of him and his posterity to the succession immediately after the duke of Berry, and before the archduke and the duke of Savoy P. As to the campaign, the operations of it were not very considerable, but, such as they were, they turned to his advantage ; he took and demolished several places on the frontiers of Portugal, destroyed one half of the English and Dutch auxiliaries, and gave the people of Portugal a very ill impression of the war. On the other hand, those people were by no means pleased to see duke Schomberg and baron Fagel at the head of the troops ; the former quarrelled with the king of Portugal ; and the admiral with king Charles, about his father's arrears ; and with a Spanish nobleman about his notions, which he treated as visions and chimeras. However, the admiral's policy soon after served him in good stead with the two kings. He was restored into favour ; and the earl of Galway was appointed to command the army, as the foreign general most acceptable to the troops q.

Archduke comes on board an English fleet to Lisbon, and assumes the title of Charles the third.

<sup>m</sup> QUINCY, Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV. Histoire generale d'Espagne. <sup>n</sup> BURNET'S History of his own Times. <sup>o</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1704.

Gibraltar
taken by the English
seamen,
and naval fight off Malaga.

WHILE the king made the campaign in the summer, the order that had been so long respited with regard to the principles of Urfins was carried into execution ; and, upon receiving an order to quit Madrid in forty-eight hours, she retired accordingly on the 16th of April, to the inexpressible grief of the queen of Spain r. It was also supposed to chagrin cardinal Portocarrero, who remained at Toledo, and could not be persuaded to return to court, though the king bestowed on him the high office of inquisitor-general. The fleet of the allies, under the command of Sir George Rooke, having the prince of Darmstadt on board, and between three and four thousand regular troops, made an attempt upon

P Corps Diplomatique, tom. viii. part i. p. 154. q Histoire gen. d'Espagne, BURNET's History of his own Times. r Mercure historique & politique.

Barcelona ; but, through the care of the viceroy Don Francisco de Velasco, it proved ineffectual. They sailed from the coast of Catalonia in the beginning of June, and about two months after appeared before Gibraltar, which was furiously cannonaded. The prince of Darmstadt, with his troops, were landed on the isthmus ; but the place was taken by the courage of the English seamen, under the command of the captains Whitaker and Jumper ; and indeed it was no great wonder, the garrison consisting but of one hundred men*. The prince of Darmstadt was left with a strong garrison ; and the fleet, on the 24th of August, engaged, at a small distance from Malaga, the navy of France, commanded by the count de Thoulouse. Both sides claimed the victory, to which neither had a clear title ; but it was afterwards known that Sir George Rooke had so little ammunition, that his obliging the French fleet to retire added as much to his reputation as the most signal victory would have done, if it had been gained before the taking of Gibraltar†.

THE allies promised themselves much from the autumn Excessive campaign on the side of Portugal ; both the kings, Don Pe- honours dro and Don Carlos were in the field ; and the army of king Philip, commanded by marshal Berwick, was very thin ; not- conferred on marshal Tesse by K. Philip withstanding which, they did little or nothing. This was in part owing to the disputes between Lord Galway and Baron Fagel, partly to the hatred the Portuguese had to their heretic allies, but chiefly to their disappointment with respect to the Spaniards, who they imagined would have deserted in great numbers ; which was so far from being the case, that the peasants chose to have their villages burnt, rather than own king Charles‡. On the other hand, the duke of Berwick found himself so uneasy, that he demanded to be recalled ; which was granted, and marshal Tesse sent in his stead, whom king Philip honoured with the order of the Golden Fleece, created him grandee of Spain, and captain general, with the same powers and appointments that Don Juan of Austria had enjoyed ; all which, however, contributed nothing to his success, since the sending him into Spain has been compared by the French writers to the replacing Villars by Tallard in Bavaria, which ruined the elector's affairs, as this new grandee had like to have done

* BURNET'S History of his own Times, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, LAMBERT, Memoires, tom. iii. p. 324.

† QUINCY, BURNET, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par M. VOLTAIRE. ‡ Memoire historique & politique, Hist. gen. d'Espagne.

those of king Philip, who even at Madrid found himself surrounded by enemies; and though he was so fortunate as to discover their designs, yet he missed seizing the count de Cifuentes, by whom they were conducted, who acted in concert with the admiral of Castile, and in whom afterwards Charles III. principally confided <sup>w</sup>, though the warmth of that nobleman's temper gave him frequent uneasiness.

Siege of Gibraltar
carried on with great
obstinacy,
and without effect.

A. D.

1705.

In the present situation of his affairs, king Philip found it equally impracticable to defend his person and dominions, without imposing new taxes, and to levy those taxes without exciting continual murmurs, and in some places insurrections. The great aversion the Spaniards had to the French still subsisted, or rather increased, though they could not but be sensible that the king went every day more and more into the Spanish customs, and had recourse to them out of pure necessity. Commerce in Spain was lost to such a degree, that king Philip was obliged to permit even his enemies to resume it, provided they made use of neutral vessels <sup>x</sup>. In the midst of these distresses he made some great efforts. He fixed a fund for the maintenance of the army, and, when it was deficient, borrowed of the treasurer of the French troops; which, in spite of their ill-will, induced the Spanish officers to desire that the whole army might be put upon the same foot, and paid in the same way. He established household troops after the mode of his grandfather; and, by having Spanish, Italian, and Walloon guards, found means to draw many young men of the best houses to enter into the service; which was of great use to him. He likewise fixed a cabinet council, composed of persons upon whom he could depend; and into which Mr. Amelot, the French minister, was admitted, who, being of the long robe, and a very wise and grave man, became highly acceptable to the Spaniards. Cardinal Portocarrero, though he declined the high office of inquisitor-general, gave the king all the assistance he could, and, as he had done from the beginning, rendered him all the services in his power <sup>y</sup>. The king and his ministers, however, persisted in carrying on the siege of Gibraltar, which had been formed in the month of October, in the preceding year, by the marquis de Villadarias, and had been continued through the winter, at a vast expence of men and money, to very little purpose; for the prince of Darmstadt, who defended it, was a good officer, a man of inflexible courage, and, having the sea open, received continual supplies. Once indeed it might have been taken; for a peasant shewed them a road at the back of the mountain, by which a detachment of five hundred men reached the top of it, and attacked the works, which were but slight on that side, so vigorously, that, if they had been properly supported, they must have carried the place. This error induced the king to send marshal Tesse thither, and procured an order to Baron Pontis to sail thither with a squadron of five large men of war, notwithstanding he represented how dangerous a step they obliged him to take. He was quickly attacked by the English fleet, by whom three of his ships were taken, and he was forced to run the other two on shore. Upon this, on the 23d of April, the siege was raised<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>w</sup> Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>x</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1705. <sup>y</sup> Vide aut. sup. citat.

WHILE the Spanish army was employed in the fruitless Conse- siege of Gibraltar, the Portuguese and their allies were in quences of the field with scarce any force to oppose them. The first the admi-
 place they invested was Salvaterra, the governor of which, ante's having made his terms with the admirante, no sooner received contri- his money, than he opened the gates; but his garrison, con- vances, to sisting of four hundred and thirty men, chose to be conducted the time of prisoners to Lisbon, rather than take arms against king Philip. his decease.
Valencia de Alcantara was the next, where Don Alonso de Mariaga commanded, with a garrison of three hundred and fifty men, strong by situation, but ill fortified; it made a gallant, indeed a wonderful defence; for the governor stood five assaults, the last of which continued several hours, and, when he surrendered, there were but one hundred and twelve men left; and these, being disarmed, and sent prisoners under a guard of a troop of horse, seized the arms of their escort while they were at dinner, and, with the assistance of their horses, made their escape to a man<sup>3</sup>. Albuquerque in Estramadura was taken after seven days open trenches. And thus ended the summer campaign, during which, however, king Philip met with misfortunes that chagrined him much more than the sense of his losses. The effects of the ad-mirante's correspondencies produced these apprehensions.
 A plot was discovered at Granada, managed by a physician and a monk, for cutting the throats of the garrison; another of the same kind at Valencia, by mere accident; both fixed the design to the eleventh of June: at length the capital

<sup>2</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, BURNET'S History of his own Times, Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. iv. p. 204. <sup>3</sup> QUINCY, Hist.
 Militaire de Louis XIV. Memoires de LA TORRE, tom. iv.
 p. 240.

conspiracy came to be known, or rather suspected, for it was never clearly made out; the scheme was, to seize the persons of the king and queen at Buen Retiro, and to carry them prisoners to Lisbon, or, if that was found impracticable, to stab them by the way. As the marquis de Leganez was governor of Buen Retiro, and as he had desired leave to make a tour to his estates in the country at the time the design was to have been executed, it drew a suspicion upon him, though he was universally allowed to be the finest gentleman, one of the ablest statesmen, and one of the best officers, in Spain. He was arrested coming out of the king's apartment, and sent prisoner to Pampeluna, from thence removed into France, and at length suffered to reside in his own house at Paris, where he lived in universal esteem to the time of his decease, which was about six years after <sup>b</sup>. The miscarriage of this design, accompanied with some reproaches from some of those to whose interest he had sacrificed his own, broke the heart of the admiral <sup>c</sup> on the 23d of June, at Lisbon, to the no small satisfaction of the court of Madrid, where, however he might be ridiculed and despised by others, they stood at least in as great fear of his artifices as of the arms of the allies, nor were they entirely delivered from the effects of them even by his death (B).

A GRAND

<sup>b</sup> Memoires historiques & chronologiques, QUINCY, Mer-cure historique & politique. <sup>c</sup> BURNET'S History of his own Times, tom. ii. p. 419.

(B) The titles of this extraordinary person, somewhat more at large, run thus: Don Juan Enriquez de Cabrera, seventh duke of Medina de Rio Seco, eleventh admiral of Castile, count of Melgar, Modica, and Cabrera. Don Fadrique, or Frederick, twin brother to Don Henry the second, king of Castile, the son of Don Alonso the eleventh, by the famous Donna Leonora de Guzman. was the founder of this family, and was the father of Don Alonso Enriquez, though it is not clear who was his mother (3). Some authors say a very beautiful woman, whose name was Paloma; but the generality of writers incline, perhaps out of respect to the family, to make him the son of Blanch of Bourbon, the wife of Don Pedro the Cruel (4). But it is certain that Henry the third conferred upon him the office of admiral of Castile; that Don Juan the second created Frederic Enriquez, the son of Alonso, conde de Melgar; and that the emperor Charles the fifth made Don Ferdinand En-

(3) Etat present de l'Espagne, par l'Abbé de Vayrac, tom. iv. p. 161. (4) Revision de l'Etat de l'Espagne, p. 39.

A GRAND fleet of the allies, commanded by the earl of Barcelona Peterborough and Sir Cloudefley Shovel, having taken Charles taken by the third on board at Lisbon, sailed for the coast of Catalonia, where some places revolted in their favour, and where the allies, and be- comes the they landed a body of ten thousand men, between Barcelona

riquet, who was the grandson of Don Frederic, duke of Medina de Rio Seco. But the title of admirante was held so much more honourable, that the rest were hardly ever mentioned (5). This nobleman, in his father's life-time, bore the title of Conde de Melgar, and was esteemed one of the ablest persons in the court of Charles the second, had the government of Milan bestowed upon him, and stood so high in the favour of his last queen, that for some time he was in a manner absolute at court. The fierceness of his temper, and the haughtiness of his disposition, made him so many enemies, that he was driven from court in spite of all the interest of his protectress. He had the greatest personal enmity possible to cardinal Portocarrero, opposed him in every thing, and attached himself openly, and with great vehemence, to the interests of the house of Austria (6). This did not hinder king Philip from endeavouring to gain him; and it is very certain that the admirante made not the least scruple of acknowledging his title, or of accepting the character of his ambassador to the court of France. When he retired into Portugal, he sent for his nephew the marquis of Alcanizas to Zamora, where he proposed his going with him. The marquis, seeing how he was attended, dissembled his sentiments, that he might not be carried away by force, made his escape in the night, and brought the first news of his uncle's evasion to the queen at Saragossa, where he was received with great joy, and ever after treated with the utmost respect. As for the admirante, he had a graceful person, great courage, and prodigious capacity (7). He was strictly and properly the author of the war in Spain; and though some great men have treated him as a wild, chimerical, visionary politician, and condemned his projects as romantic and impracticable (8), yet, to do him justice, he had most amazing talents, and bid very fair, by his contrivances, for expelling the king he had left, and setting upon the throne the prince whose claim he espoused; but when he saw how little he was considered by those for whom he had done so much, and how obstinate they were in undoing all that he had done, grief, indignation, and resentment, first broke his temper, and then his heart (9).

(5) Etat present de l'Espagne, par l'Abbé de Vayrac, tom. iv. p. 162.

(6) Mémoires de la Torres, Histoire de la Cour de Madrid. Mercurie historique & politique.

(7) Etat present de l'Espagne, par l'Abbé de Vayrac, tom. iv. p. 33.

(8) Histoire generale d'Espagne, tom. ix. p. 77, 78. Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Use of History, vol. ii. p. 87.

(9) Mémoires pour servir a l'Histoire du xviii. Siecle, par M. de Lambert, tom. iii. p. 521.

seat of Charles
the third's government.

and Palamos; and, being joined by a considerable number of Miquelets, broke ground before Barcelona on the 28th of August. Don Francisco de Velasco, viceroy for king Philip, having but a slender garrison, summoned the inhabitants, and told them, that he would deal fairly by them; and that if any person was inclined in his sentiments to the opposite party, he should have free leave to go out; but that, if he discovered any treachery afterwards, he would punish it with the utmost severity; but there were none who accepted of this proposal. It was however believed, that the prince of Hesse had engaged the governor of Montjuic to make the reduction of that fortress no difficult enterprize; but the viceroy prevented this, by hanging the governor, and changing the garrison. When, therefore, the prince came to to make the attack, he met with an obstinate resistance, in which himself and four or five hundred English were killed. The Spaniards are persuaded, that this lost them the place; for they affirm, that, when the earl of Peterborough heard the prince of Darmstadt was killed, he suffered himself to say, or rather to think aloud, Then Barcelona is to be taken; and, rallying the troops in person, with the assistance of fresh reinforcements, attacked and carried the fortress. Upon this the inhabitants discovered their real sentiments, and compelled the viceroy to give up the place by capitulation, which he did on the 9th of October<sup>d</sup>. He was constrained to demand the earl of Peterborough's protection, to prevent his sharing the same fate with his deputy, who was murdered by the inhabitants. All Catalonia, Roses only excepted, declared for king Charles, and the greatest part of the kingdom of Valencia did the like<sup>e</sup>. The autumn campaign on the side of Portugal was more favourable to king Philip; for marshal Tesse forced the marquis las Minas to raise the siege of Badajoz, where the earl of Galway lost his right arm, and where the generals of the allies differed so much amongst themselves, that Baron Fagel procured himself to be recalled. The princess of Ursins returned this year into Spain, and the king and queen went some miles out of Madrid to receive her; and, which is stranger, the French court made her very rich presents, to pacify that resentment which her short exile might have raised<sup>f</sup>. But these, however, made but very little impression.

<sup>d</sup> QUINCY Histoire Milit. de Louis XIV. LAMBERTI, Memoires, tom. iii. BURNET'S History of his own Times, Memoires historiques & chronologiques, LARREY, Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, by JOHN FRIEND, M. D. p. 44. <sup>e</sup> Mercure historique & politique, QUINCY, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

On the loss of Barcelona, the friends and the enemies of king Philip began to doubt what turn affairs might take, more especially as a great part of Arragon, and almost all Valentia, gave evident proofs of their inclination to revolt in favour of his competitor. But they began to recover their spirits at Madrid, when it was known what efforts France was determined to make on their behalf. It was then resolved that king Philip should march in person with the army into Catalonia, in order to besiege Barcelona, while the count de Thoulouse, with the French fleet, blocked it up by sea: that the duke of Berwick, with a small army, should watch the motions of the Portuguese, while the duke de Noailles entered Catalonia on the side of France with seven or eight thousand men, in order to hinder the Catalans from disturbing the siege. The queen was to be again left regent in worse circumstances than ever; for, in reality, she was as much exposed in the capital, as her consort at the head of his army. The plan was certainly well laid; and, notwithstanding all her losses, France took care that on her side it should be well executed; for the duke of Noailles was early in the field, as the count de Thoulouse was at sea; but it was out of the power of king Philip to be so expeditious. The count de la Torres, indeed, took Villa Real in the beginning of January, and the king put himself at the head of his army before the end of February; and yet, through a series of unlucky accidents, the month of April was begun before he arrived in sight of Barcelona with an army of about 20,000 men, commanded under him by marshal Tesse, and abundantly supplied with artillery, ammunition, and other necessaries, from the fleet. This was one of the most remarkable sieges in the present century, since Charles the third persisted in his resolution of remaining in the place, where he had a strong garrison, and a flying camp under the earl of Peterborough in the neighbourhood. The trenches were opened on the 6th of April; on the 20th of the same month the Catalans found themselves obliged to abandon Montjuic, from which the loss of the city seemed inevitable. But the king's person so animated the besieged, tho' he was almost every day perplexed in pacifying their quarrels, that it held out till the 8th of May, when the fleet of the allies, under the command of vice admiral Leake, appeared upon the Besieged by king Philip and marshal Tesse to very little purpose.

A. D.
1706.

<sup>f</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

coast; which obliged the count of Toulouse to withdraw with his squadron; notwithstanding which, the army continued the siege till the thirteenth, when it was raised, with the mortifying circumstance of leaving not only their artillery and magazines, but also their hospitals, with a vast number of sick and wounded, whom he recommended to the clemency of the earl of Peterborough, who treated them with the same care and kindness as if they had been his own. This was the greatest misfortune that Philip had hitherto sustained; the rather, because he was obliged to take a vast compass in his retreat, and that the reputation both of the Spanish and French officers suffered by it exceedingly; while, on the other hand, the allies gained great advantage, and the resolution of Charles, by which, out of all doubt, Barcelona was preserved, did him great honour in the eyes of Europe.

The army of the allies, with the troops
of Portugal, make themselves
masters of Madrid.

As the allies had made prodigious efforts to augment their forces in Portugal, and as the army commanded by the duke of Berwick was very weak, the marquis de las Minas and the earl of Galway, having taken possession of Alcantara, resolved to attack Ciudad Rodrigo; which having accomplished, and having received the acceptable news of raising the siege of Barcelona, they continued their march to Salamanca, of which they became masters on the 7th of June<sup>a</sup>. It being evident that they intended to push their good fortune, and to make themselves masters of Madrid, the French ambassador, Mr. Amelot, held a kind of general assembly of the grandees, in which he desired them to explain themselves clearly, for that his most Christian majesty did not desire to impose his grandson upon them; and, if he did, his circumstances at that time left it no way in his power; so that it was become both expedient and necessary for them to consider for whom, and in what manner, they would act for restoring peace, and the blessings of a legal government to their country. The duke de Medina Cœli answered, in the name of the grandees, that though they wanted not some reasons of complaint arising from the flights they had received, and from the too great influence of the prince of Ursins, yet their affections continued inviolable to king Phi- lip, for whose service they were willing to do all that lay in their power. The king himself arrived about this time, having left the remains of his army in Navarre; and, after mature deliberation, sent away the queen and her family to Burgos on the 18th of the same month, under a good escort, and took the same route himself the next day<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Memoires de Marquis de FEUQUERES, tom. iv. pag. 114. QUINCY, LAMBERTI, tom. iv. p. 146. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, BURNET's Hist. of his own Times, Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, p. 59. <sup>b</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, LARREY, QUINCY, Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV.

THE army of the allies, upon his retreat, entered, and took possession of Madrid, after sending exprefs upon exprefs to invite king Charles to come thither without delay; but that monarch being engaged in the reduction of the kingdom of Arragon, and being desirous of making his public entry as he did into Saragossa, made less haste than they expected, and the earl of Peterborough being also busy in subduing Valencia, they found their hopes frustrated of seeing their whole forces united while they were masters of the capital<sup>2</sup>. They had, however, the satisfaction of learning that *Carthagen*a and Alicant were subdued, and of seeing Toledo for some days in their power. But the scene was quickly changed, through the activity of king Philip, and the abilities of the duke of Berwick, who, after retreating far enough to be joined by the troops from Navarre, and being, by that junction, become superior to the allies, began in their turn to advance towards Madrid, which, for want of subsistence, the allies were forced to quit, and to retreat to the strong camp of Guadalaxara, where they were joined by king Charles, and soon after by the earl of Peterborough; notwithstanding which, through the weakness of their forces, or misintelligence amongst their generals, they still continued their retreat, which gave the duke of Berwick an opportunity of penetrating with his army into Valencia, while king Philip returned to Madrid, into which he made his public entry on the 22d of September<sup>1</sup>. One of the first steps taken upon his return was, to send the duke of Offuna with a troop of guards to remove the queen dowager from Toledo, and to conduct her to Burgos. The people of the first-mentioned city had taken it into their heads, that she invited the Portuguese into Castile; and this afforded the court a pretence, under colour of providing for her safety, to carry her first to Burgos, and from thence to Bayonne, where she was received with all possible testimonies of joy and respect,

By the dilatoriness of Charles the third, king Philip recovers his capital.

<sup>1</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1706. QUINCY, Hist. Militaire, tom. v. p. 282, LARREY, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>2</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, tom. ii. p. 448, 449. QUINCY, Memoires Historiques & Chronologiques. <sup>1</sup> Mercure historique & politique, and where she lived in great tranquillity upon her annuity of four hundred thousand pieces of eight<sup>m</sup>. Before the end of the year count Mahony, who had gallantly defended Alicant, made himself master of Carthagena, and the marquis de Baye recovered Alcantara from the Portuguese. These small successes, however, made no amends for the loss of the islands of Majorca and Ivica, of the Low Countries, in consequence of the battle of Ramillies, and of the duchy of Milan, which followed upon the defeat of the army of the two crowns before Turin<sup>n</sup>.

Methods pursued by him, in order to re-establish his affairs.
A. D.
1707.

It must be allowed, that king Philip, by the advice probably of cardinal Portocarrero, availed himself prodigiously, at the beginning of this year, of those disgraces which had been suffered in the last. He confiscated the estates of the conde de Oropesa, the conde de Cardona, the conde de Cifuentes, and, in general, of all the nobility that had declared for Charles III. and obliged their families to quit Castile, and retire to Barcelona; which was alleged to be a necessary severity, to prevent that kind of intelligence which might have been fatal to his affairs<sup>o</sup>. He annexed several hereditary offices of great profit to the crown, which, though at any other time it would have been liable to censure, was now applauded. He drew great sums from the clergy by an adroit management of the danger they were under, if the arms of heretics should prevail. He solicited the voluntary assistance of his subjects, and accepted very graciously the smallest marks of it either in money or in men<sup>p</sup>. Some fortunate circumstances concurred with these endeavours; a few ships from America arrived safely at Brest, and they brought a free gift of a million from the duke of Albuquerque, as a testimony of his subjects loyalty. The count de Villars, brother to the marshal, recovered the island of Minorca, which had revolted; and the queen's pregnancy was declared, which filled the people with joy and hopes<sup>q</sup>. On the 18th of April the duke of Orleans, afterwards regent of France, arrived at Madrid, where the king caused him to be received as an infant of Castile<sup>r</sup>.

<sup>m</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, BURNET.      <sup>n</sup> Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Hist. gen. d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, BURNET's Hist. of his own Times.      <sup>o</sup> Mercure historique & politique. A. D. 1707.      <sup>p</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne,      <sup>q</sup> Mercure historique & politique.      <sup>r</sup> QUINCY, Hist. Militaire de Louis XIV.

MARSHAL Berwick was in the field with the army, to prevent the enemy from returning into Castile, and, when joined by the troops he expected, to proceed in the conquest of the kingdom of Valencia. The marquis de las Minas and the earl of Galway, with about sixteen thousand horse and foot, began the campaign early, in hopes of destroying the Spanish magazines, and covering the kingdom of Valencia. They did destroy several magazines, which they had better have kept, since they afterwards resolved to besiege the castle of Villuna. It was a place of little strength, and no great consequence, yet the duke of Berwick marched to relieve it, for he knew the allies wanted subsistence, and thought their retreat before him would raise the spirits of his soldiers, and add reputation to his arms. The earl of Galway was for fighting, and prevailed upon the other generals to come into his opinion; upon which they advanced into the plain of Almanza, where they attacked the duke of Berwick on the 25th of April. The English troops, at the beginning of the action, penetrated through the centre of the Spanish army; but the Spanish cavalry having broke the Portuguese, and the French infantry making a dreadful fire upon their flanks, the army of the allies was at last broke, and, when it was almost dark, began their retreat. Colonel Hill carried off the remains of thirteen battalions towards the river Xucar, which if they could have passed, they might have been safe; but as they marched in the morning as soon as it was light, and had fought till it was dark, their fatigue obliged them to halt; and this gave the Spaniards an opportunity to surround them, so that they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. In short, the victory was complete; there was a great number killed and wounded, several thousands taken prisoners, many of whom were French, who had taken service with the allies after the defeats of Hochstet and Ramillies, and who, returning to their standards, replaced those who had fallen in the battle. The marquis de las Minas was dangerously wounded, and his mistress, in the garb of an amazon, killed by his side. The earl of Galway had two cuts cross the face, which, though not dangerous, hindered him from seeing, or giving orders. One hundred and twenty standards, with all the artillery and baggage, were taken. The duke of Orleans, tho' he did not arrive time enough to have a share in the battle, came very opportunely to improve its consequences, and, in that respect, did all that could be desired.

* BURNET'S History of his own Times, LIMIERs, &c.

The kingdoms of Arragon and Valencia reduced, and deprived of their privileges.

THE town of Requena was the first that surrendered to the duke of Orleans; this was followed by the capital, and most other places in Valentia, except Xativa, Denia, and Alicant. The duke then entered the kingdom of Arragon, where Saragossa opened its gates on the 25th. The duke of Noailles recovered Cardagna, and the marquis de Baye retook Castel Rodrigo from the Portuguese. Thus the kingdoms of Valentia and Arragon were once more obliged to own Don Philip, who made them pay very severely for embracing the cause of his competitor; and for some affronts which they had offered to his government, the city of Saragossa was obliged to pay forty-five thousand pistoles, and the rest of the kingdom ninety-thousand<sup>t</sup>. In Valentia, the town and castle of Xativa being reduced, the whole place was burnt down, except the church, and one hundred and thirty houses belonging to those who had been disarmed, and made prisoners, for not concurring with the rest, and a column of infamy erected; but these were slight things in comparison of depriving both the kingdoms of their constitution, and subjecting them for the future to the laws of Castile. This was done by a decree dated the 29th of June, which was softened by another dated the 29th of July, by which the nobility of Arragon and Valentia were rendered capable of all offices and honours throughout the king's dominions, and leave was given to rebuild the town of Xativa, under the name of St. Philip<sup>u</sup>.

Prince of Asturias born, to the great joy of the Spanish nation.

ON the 25th of August the queen was delivered of a prince, who was baptized by the name of Lewis, and immediately acknowledged presumptive heir apparent of the crown of Castile and its dependencies. Cardinal Portocarrero, upon this occasion, made a present of five thousand pistoles to the king's treasury; his example was followed by most of the grandees, and all the cities and great towns. Some of the nobility, who had withdrawn themselves, took this opportunity of making their peace: king Philip accepted their presents, and, to shew how much he was of their mind, ordered the duke of Infantado to be released, and recalled the conde de Lemos, the marquis del Carpio, and the rest of the exiles. He dispatched the first courier with the news to the queen dowager at Bayonne, who made public rejoicings<sup>w</sup> for three days, sent two of her gentlemen to compliment their majesties, with very rich presents for the queen and prince. On the 13th of October Lerida surrendered to the duke of Orleans, as the castle did a month after, on the very day that, through the intrigues of the princess of Ursins, he received the king's orders to raise the siege; and the beginning of the month following he set out for Paris*. About this time Charles III. espoused the princess of Wolfenbuttle, and, by his return from the army to Barcelona, stifled a dangerous sedition, occasioned by the people's apprehensions that they were abandoned, and that Catalonia would be exposed to the same chastisements the people of Arragon and Valentia had endured. This year also the kingdom of Naples revolted; and the duke of Escalona, being taken in Gaeta by count Daun, was, after being threatened with hanging, exposed on horseback, through the streets of Naples, to the insults of the populace, and then thrust into a prison, though he was a nobleman of the most unspotted character, and one who had never enriched himself at their expence. This revolution, though it cost Spain dear, saved Toulon, which was perhaps of equal consequence even to king Philip†.

<sup>t</sup> Mercure historique & politique, QUINCY, BURNET, LIMERS.

<sup>u</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, BURNET, Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>w</sup> Mercure historique & politique, BURNET's History of his own Times.

AT the opening of this year the court of Madrid was Duke of very sensibly chagrined by the loss of the fortress of Oran, Orleans which for so many years had been defended against the commands Moors. This was owing to the desertion of the count of the king's Santa Cruz, who carried the small squadron, and little body troops of troops, with which he was intrusted for its relief, to with success, and yet displeases Charles III. at Barcelona‡. The duke of Orleans obtained at Paris a supply of five millions, that is, about two hundred pleases and forty thousand pounds of our money, for the service of him. Spain, and carried back to Madrid the crown jewels, which A. D. had been sent into France, when their majesties were obliged to leave Madrid. The duke, when he came to the army, found things in a condition very different from what he expected, and was farther disappointed by the loss of a great convoy of provisions and ammunition, the greatest part of which was taken by the English fleet§. The same fleet landed at Barcelona count Starembergh, an officer of great abilities and great reputation, who immediately took

A. D.
1708.

* QUINCY, LIMIERS, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.
† Memoire de LA TORRE, tom. v. p. 57. BURNET, QUINCY, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.
‡ Mercure historique & chronologique, Histoire chronologique.
§ BURNET's History of his own Times, Histoire generale d'Espagne, QUINCY.

the command of the troops in Catalonia, and disposed things in such a manner, as to give the duke of Orleans all the trouble he could. This did not, however, hinder that prince from besieging Tortosa, a large place, well fortified, and exceedingly strong by situation. The siege was carried on slowly and cautiously; for, on one side, his royal highness was extremely sparing of men's lives, and, on the other, he respected the neighbourhood of count Starembergh, which obliged him to be constantly on his guard. On the 11th of July the place was taken, notwithstanding the duke received scarce any assistance from Madrid, where the princess of Ursins had insinuated to king Philip, that he had as much to fear from the duke of Orleans as from Charles III.; and tho' it is said the king was afterwards disabused upon this head, yet, on the duke's return from the campaign, he met with so dry a reception, that he quickly set out for Paris<sup>b</sup>. The chevalier de Arsfeldt took Denia by storm, and put all the garrison, and a great part of the people, to the sword. After this he besieged Alicant, which was surrendered upon honourable terms; but being informed, that the Spanish troops in Minorca had been put under arrest on account of what he had done at Xativa, he sent a detachment of horse after the garrison of Alicant, and seized them in like manner. At Barcelona, Charles III. received his new queen in a very pompous manner; soon after which the duke de Moles was declared his prime minister in the room of the count de Oropesa, who died suddenly<sup>c</sup>. The intrigues of his party, but more especially the monks, caused an insurrection in Sardinia; so that the marquis of Jamaica, the governor of it, finding himself abandoned, embraced the offer of an English admiral to carry him to Spain on board his fleet. He was first brought to Barcelona, where king Charles would willingly have detained him, but, insisting on his capitulation, he was allowed to go to Madrid, where, to the amazement of Philip's court, he was very well received<sup>d</sup>. General Stanbope, without any great difficulty, made himself master of the island of Minorca; and no endeavours were spared to bring about a revolution in Sicily; upon which count Mahoni was sent thither with a considerable force. Count Starembergh, who knew his army too weak to prevent the duke of

<sup>b</sup> Mercure historique & chronologique, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. LIMIERS, LARREY. <sup>c</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires, tom. v. p. 163. Memoires historiques & chronolog. Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE. <sup>d</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

Orleans's taking Tortosa, thought it strong enough to attempt the recovery of that important place; which he did on the 4th of December, and was near succeeding, but, thro' the care and courage of the governor, was at length repulsed, though it cost that brave man his life. There was no action this year on the side of Portugal; but, to console king Philip for the losses he had sustained, the galleons arrived safe, by which he acquired twelve hundred thousand pieces of eight, exclusive of nine hundred thousand sent as a present to the young prince of Asturias, whose birth had already brought him many other advantages, and of whom the Spaniards were so fond, that he was forced to be shewn to them from the balcony of the palace, when he was scarce a week old.

It had been the misfortune of king Philip to be distressed, King Philip from the very beginning of his reign, in point of revenues; lip, by the and this distress had gone on increasing, notwithstanding all advice of the methods that could be devised to prevent it, till, at the cardinal beginning of this year, things were found in such a situa- Portocarrero-tion, that it was equally difficult to find recruits for the army, ro, puts or subsistence for those regiments that wanted recruits. In himself on all other respects the king's affairs were equally embarrassed; the affec- so that cardinal Portocarrero, and the grandees most sincerely tions of attached to this interest, could testify it no other way than his own by giving him, as they did, the strongest assurances that they people; would perish with him. Out of this distress his enemies A. D. delivered him; his grandfather consented to treat of a 1709: peace; and the terms prescribed to him were, to treat of it on the foot of abandoning his grandson. He was compelled to submit, and, exclusive of the negotiation, his necessities were such, that he could no longer yield him any supplies, and was constrained to withdraw part of his forces. Cardinal Portocarrero hinted to king Philip, that he should seize this opportunity of putting his affairs intirely on a Spanish bottom. The king took his advice; the duke de Medina Cœli was declared prime minister; the marquis de Bedmar secretary at war; the French ambassador was excluded from council, and sent home; some domestics of the duke of Orleans were arrested, imprisoned, and treated with great severity. To complete all, as soon as the preliminaries were made public, and dispersed by the allies, king Philip addressed a circular letter to his subjects, penned with great plainness, and in terms the most pathetic. In this he exaggerated the hardships put upon his grandfather, not only to abandon him absolutely, but to assist in dethroning him: yet, in this, he said, the allies did him honour, since it shewed their opinion that he would defend himself to the last extremity; which he assured them was his intention, and that he was resolved to die at the head of the last Spanish squadron, and to tinge the dear earth of Castile with his blood. This had its effect; for the enthusiasm of this declaration diffused itself through the whole nation. The general assembly of the clergy not only granted a free gift, but the prelates, and those who were able, paid it upon the spot. The nobility sent their plate to be coined; the middle and the common sort of people acted with the like spirit, for the king had told them in his letter, that the allies had promised the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal handsome rewards out of the Spanish dominions; that the emperor would take what he pleased; and that the archduke was to be content with the rest, upon such terms as those who conquered it for them should be inclined to dictate. The putting things into this form was the last service rendered by cardinal Portocarrero, who died in the month of September, at the age of seventy-four, and was succeeded in the see of Toledo by Don Antonio Ibanez, archbishop of Saragossa, and inquisitor-general<sup>1</sup>. In respect to military affairs, there happened nothing material. Marshal Berzons commanded the army of the two crowns, and he had instructions from Lewis XIV. not to act offensively. Count Starembergh, with his army, passed two rivers in his sight; upon which king Philip wrote the marshal a very smart letter, and went in person to the army, where, though he was able to do nothing, yet this stroke of vivacity pleased the Spaniards highly. However, the castle of Alicant, after a blockade of several months, surrendered to the chevalier d'Arsfeldt; and the marquis de Baye beat the earl of Galway and the Portuguese army in the plain of Gudina, and made fifteen hundred prisoners, which prevented their besieging Badajoz. Vast levies were made, and all possible precautions taken, in the winter, to act with the greatest vigour in the spring, more especially in Catalonia, where king Charles was master only of Barcelona, Gironne, and Tarragona, covered by the small army of count Starembergh, who very wisely waited for supplies &c.

* Memoires de LA TOURRE, Histoire chronologique, Histoire gen. d'Espagne.

<sup>1</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. LARREY, Memoires de LA TORRE, Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1709. Histoire generale d'Espagne, Histoire chronologique, BURNET'S History of his own Times.

At the opening of the year, Monsieur d'Iberville arrived at Madrid, with the title of envoy extraordinary from his most minister, Christian majesty: the king received him in public but very the duke de coldly, and, upon his demanding a private audience, referred Medina him to the duke of Medina Cœli. The business of this mi- Cœli, con- nister was to qualify the offer that his master had made, of visited of depositing cautionary towns in the hands of the states, till treason. his grandson was driven out of Spain, and to furnish the A. D. expences of the war. His stay was but short; king Philip withdrew his countenance from the French; and the queen, giving way to her resentment, went somewhat farther, and treated them so ill, that some returned home<sup>h</sup>. Philip did not think fit to publish another circular letter; but, in a short edict for raising recruits, he declared that his sole resources were the unshaken fidelity and heroic courage of the Spanish nation<sup>i</sup>. There wanted not some, however, who insinuated, that he used this language only in compliance with his circumstances; but it fell out luckily, that the flo- tilla arrived on the 2d of March at Cadiz, with about ten millions on board. Two of these ships were French, and were very desirous of sailing home with their cargoes, which however the king obliged them to debark, and insisted upon an extraordinary indulto, which the captains refusing to pay, they were put in prison. These proceedings gratified the Spaniards extremely; and the king drew out of the money about two millions, which were of inexpressible service at that juncture<sup>k</sup>. It was resolved that the marquis de Baye should command in Estremadura against the Portuguese; and the marquis de Villedarias the grand army in Catalonia, which consisted of twenty-three thousand men, under the king, who resolved to make the campaign in person. The marquis set out from Madrid on the 15th of April, in the evening of which day there happened a very extraordinary event. About eight at night the king sent for the duke of Medina Cœli into his cabinet, and, after having conferred with him for some time, directed him to go to the secretary of state's office about certain dispatches. The duke no sooner came thither,

<sup>g</sup> QUINCY, Memoires de LA TORRE, BURNET's History of his own Times, LARREY, LIMIERS, Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

<sup>h</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1710.

<sup>i</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, Histoire chronologique, BURNET, QUINCY.

<sup>k</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

than he was arrested, and conducted in a coach and six out of town, to a castle on the road to Segovia. When the officer parted from him, he furnished him with a night-gown, a box of chocolate, a purse with a hundred pistoles, and some other necessaries; for which civility, when the duke testified great acknowledgements, the officer told him they belonged to the king, who had taken care to provide them for him. As this nobleman was prime minister, and governor to the prince of Asturias, this affair made a very great noise, and it was said that he had undertaken to betray the king or the prince into the hands of their enemies<sup>1</sup>. It is certain that his misfortune arose from a letter delivered to the king by the confessor of the marquis of Astorga, who died that morning, and whose sister the duke married. The junto appointed to examine his papers condemned him four months after to suffer death, for giving intelligence to the king's enemies, particularly with respect to the real intentions of his most Christian majesty; but the king changed this sentence into imprisonment, and, being transferred from Segovia to Pampeluna, and thence to Fontarabia, he there ended his days<sup>m</sup>.

King Philip's army totally defeated near Saragossa by count Starembergh.

THIS strange affair prevented the king from going so soon to the army as otherwise he would have done; and, when he came thither, he found the weather so bad, that he was able to make but little use of his superiority over count Starembergh. However, he took Cervera, where he found a magazine of cloaths and linen for four thousand men; but he was not able to make the siege of Balaguer. After count Starembergh had received the supplies he expected, the face of affairs quickly changed, and he began to act offensively; and a part of Philip's forces received a severe check at Almanara, by the vigour and good conduct of general Stanhope; which gave the king so indifferent an opinion of the marquis of Villadarias, that he sent for the marquis de Baye, and gave him the command of the army, which, for want of subsistence, was obliged to march to Saragossa. Near that city, on the 20th of August, they were defeated by count Starembergh<sup>n</sup>. The armies were nearly equal, and neither of the kings were in the action; for Philip was ill of a fever, and the generals of Charles III. would not suffer him to expose his person. The marquis de Baye made the best retreat he could to Lerida, where, after some days, he assembled about nine thousand men; but the king immediately set out for Madrid, where, notwithstanding his misfortune, he was received with great joy. Upon the news, however, that the allies were in full march for that capital, he found it necessary to quit it with his queen and family, followed by all the grandees and councils, on the 9th of September°. The marquis de Baye, as soon as his troops were in a condition to move, prosecuted his march to Tudela, on the side of Navarre, where, by the activity of the count d'Aguilar, the army was recruited in a surprising short space of time; and the duke of Vendosme, being arrived from France, began to advance towards Valladolid with an escorte of about three thousand horse, which king Philip withdrew from the army in Andalusia (C).

<sup>1</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, History of Europe for the Year 1710. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

historique & politique.

<sup>m</sup> Mercure historique & politique. <sup>n</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

IT

• QUINCY, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, BURNET's History of his own Times.

(C) The affairs of a prince could scarce be in a worse condition than those of king Philip after the battle of Saragossa. It will contribute to the reader's information, as well as amusement, to have some particulars relating to this subject set in a true light. The shock at Almanara affected the spirits of the Spanish troops very much, as they relied chiefly upon their cavalry, who had been fairly beat by the English and Dutch (1). It was this induced them to encamp almost at the gates of Saragossa, where such precautions were used in posting the troops, that, from the prudence of count Staremborg, it was concluded, that he would not attack them; and, this being publicly discoursed in the army, they were half-beaten when attacked. The Walloon regiments, upon which they most depended, finding their communication with the army cut off, threw down their arms, and surrendered prisoners of war. This was another terrible misfortune, as they were looked upon to be the best infantry in the army (2). Saragossa revolted behind them while they were yet engaged, and, as soon as they were broke, they found it the same thing as if they had been in an enemy's country, the peasants doing them all the mischief that was in their power. The marquis de Baye, with the shattered remains of the army, could not have defended Navarre, if the allies had followed him. King Philip went in a manner alone to Madrid, a place of no strength, and without troops: he was still indisposed, could hope for little assistance from France, found several great lords inclined to

(1) Mercure historique & politique, tom. xlix. p. 227.

(2) Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du XVIIIe Siecle, par M. de Lamberti, tom. vi. p. 227.

Charles
the third takes possession of Madrid
and Toledo, but is not able to keep them.

It is impossible for human wisdom to foresee the consequences of great events, and, whatever politicians might afterwards pretend, it was impossible they should so much as suspect that the battle of Saragossa would prove the ruin of his competitor's affairs, and become the means of fixing Philip V. upon the throne; and yet this was actually the case. General Stanhope vehemently pressed marching directly to Madrid, to which it is said neither king Charles nor count Starembergh were inclined, as having no magazines, and being to march through a country so disaffected, that the people burnt their corn, and starved themselves, to prevent the allies from having any thing to eat. General Stanhope prevailed, and the march was resolved. He took it for granted that the Portuguese army would advance and make terms with the conqueror; and, in fine, was without money, without an army, and without resource. The princess of Ursins, a woman of a high spirit, is said to have exerted herself to a degree of indecorum in speaking to the king. She told him, that a crown was never to be resigned but with life; that, as things promised fair at the beginning of the campaign, fortune might come about again before the end of it; and that his own firmness and diligence, operating upon the despair of his subjects, might recover all. The queen abhor'd the thoughts of being otherwise; and perhaps abhorred still more the thoughts of living as a suppliant in the court of France, subject to the humours of her sister; which transported her so far, that, when she went out of Madrid, she held out her son to the people, and said, "When the kingdom is lost, I will die

" with my infant in my arms,
" in his own hereditary moun" tains of Asturias" (3). Before they got to Burgos, they had the consolation of knowing that their own condition was hardly worse than that of king Charles, a letter of his own being intercepted, written to his queen at Barcelona, importing, that he was carried to Madrid against his will; that the soldiers had been without bread for two days; and that his victorious army was mouldering away with sickness, famine, and fatigue (4). After all, when Spain had been lost by a numerous, regular, well-disciplined army, it was recovered the same campaign by raw and fresh-raised troops, conducted by excellent officers, who made the utmost advantage of every error the enemy committed, and of every inconvenience to which they were exposed (5).

(3) Hist. de la Cour de Madrid, p. 123. Mercurie historique & politique, Hist. gen. d'Espagne, tom. ix.

(4) Reflexions historiques & politiques de M. le Marquis de Santa Cruz de Mazanardo, tom. viii. p. 77. Hist. gen. d'Espagne, tom. ix. p. 303. Mercurie historique & politique, tom. xlix. p. 656. Lamberti, Histoire de Louis XIV.

(5) M. de S. Cruz, Campagnes de D. de Ven-desire, &c.

join them, and that this might have opened a free communication with Portugal. But, after some deliberation, the court of Lisbon absolutely rejected this measure, tho' general Stanhope had advanced with a strong detachment to favour this junction. He then demanded a thousand horse and three thousand foot from that army; which was refused. Lastly, he asked the troops of the maritime powers, and their ministers at Lisbon offered to defray the expence; but this was likewise denied. King Charles remained about six weeks at Madrid, where his necessities obliged him to tax the inhabitants at forty-two thousand pieces of eight per month. At length it was found requisite to retire, and to quit both that city and Toledo. On the 11th of November king Charles, under an escort of a thousand horse, set out for Barcelona, upon intelligence that the duke of Noailles was on the point of entering Catalonia with an army<sup>p</sup>. Soon after the king was withdrawn, the army of the allies marched to Guadalaxara.

KING Philip and the duke of Vendosme marched with numerous forces from Valladolid, and, knowing the great distresses of the people, sent a vast convoy of provisions before them to Madrid. The people received him with frantic demonstrations of joy, and, crowding about the coach of the duke of Vendosme, saluted him prophetically the deliverer of Spain<sup>q</sup>. King Philip lost no time in passing the Tagus, and surrounding general Stanhope with eight battalions and four regiments of horse and dragoons, on the 9th of December, in the little town of Brihuega. They made a great and glorious defence, disputing every inch of ground in the streets. At length the people of the place barricadoed their doors, and, beating up the tops of their houses, threw the tiles and stones upon their heads, which obliged them to surrender prisoners of war; but they were allowed to keep their baggage. Count Starembergh, upon hearing that they were invested, marched back to their relief; upon which the duke of Vendosme ordered the cavalry to march, and form themselves before Villaviciosa, whither the infantry followed as fast as it was possible. King Philip commanded the right in person, having under him the marquis de Valdecanas, captain-general; the duke de Vendosme was on the left, with the count de Aguilar; the conde de la Torres and the marquis de Thouy, both captain-generals, were in the centre. This action, which happened on the 10th of De- cember, began about three in the afternoon. The king quickly forced the left wing of the allies, defeated them entirely, took the generals Belcastle and St. Amand prisoners; but the right and the centre made a gallant defence, and, night coming on, count Starembergh made a slow and well-conducted retreat. He sent such a relation of this action to Barcelona, that they sung Te Deum, and made rejoicings for the victory, which certainly was not on their side, all their cannon and most part of their baggage being taken, with a great number of prisoners; and, in short, Starembergh returned into Catalonia with no more than seven thousand men. This action closed the campaign, and secured to king Philip all Arragon, which had again revolted after his defeat, very near the same place where this important victory was gained<sup>r</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> Histoire chronologique, BURNET, QUINCY, Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne. <sup>q</sup> Histoire des Campagnes du Duc de Vendosme. p. 18.

Both courts busy in preparation, but neither forward in action.

A. D.
1711;

THE duke de Noailles, who had opened his trenches before Gironne on the 23d of December, found himself in a very critical situation; obstinately opposed by a strong garrison, under the command of general Tattonbach, within the place; in frequent danger of having his own communication with the country behind him cut off by the Miquelets; and at last himself and his army in the utmost perils from the inundations. His firmness and prudence overcame with much ado all these obstacles; so that at length he made himself master of the lower town on the 23d, and of the upper, by capitulation, on the 25th, of January. The news of this was very acceptable to king Philip, who kept his court at Saragossa, and who had sent for his queen thither<sup>s</sup>. The duke of Vendosme retired to that city, in order to confer with him about the operations of the campaign, and to determine whether Tarragona or Barcelona should be first besieged. The princess of Ursins, who was a declared enemy to this prince, pretended sickness, that she might avoid coming to Saragossa, before he took the field. The arrival of a flotilla at Cadiz put it in the power of king Philip to give a real proof of his gratitude to the duke; and he did it at a review, by putting into his hands an order for 50,000 pieces of eight for his equipage. The duke was somewhat surprised, but, turning suddenly to the line, "These," said he, "are those brave men that fixed the fortune of Spain at "Villa-viciosa; and these only are worthy of the king's "favour;" which he caused to be distributed in necessaries amongst the private men<sup>t</sup>. After all this, the campaign was spent in little more than preparations, which was chiefly owing to the death of the emperor Joseph, on the 17th of April, soon after which there were secret negotiations for a peace<sup>u</sup>. Charles III. quitted Barcelona, in order to return into his hereditary dominions, but left his queen there, and declared count Starembergh his viceroy. A little before his departure he fell into suspicion of some of the Spaniards about him, and carried this so far, as to cause the duke of Moles, his secretary, to be arrested. On the other hand, the duke of Uzeda, who had been king Philip's ambassador at Rome, and had quitted that city to retire to Genoa, upon the pope's being obliged to acknowledge Charles III. to the surprize of all the world, quitted that city, to come and acknowledge the same prince himself<sup>w</sup>. The queen being much indisposed, the king passed a great part of the summer with her and the prince of Asturias at Corella, for the benefit of the waters. From thence, in October, they proceeded to Aranjuez, and returned from thence to Madrid. About this time marshal Starembergh formed a scheme for recovering Tortosa, and burning all the Spanish magazines; which he had certainly effected, if the duke of Vendosme's steward, who had obtained a passport for going into the camp of the allies, in order to procure fresh fish for his master, had not overheard something of it, which he communicated to the duke by the trumpet that was sent with him, who gave timely notice to the governor, which prevented the surprize, and cost the allies the lives of some hundred men<sup>x</sup>. At the close of the year king Philip had upwards of thirty, and king Charles upwards of twenty, thousand regular troops in Catalonia, where the latter possessed only Barcelona, Tarragona, and Montalban.

<sup>r</sup> QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. BURNET's History of his own Times, Mercure historique & politique, LAMBERS, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Histoire des Campagnes du Duc de Vendosme.
<sup>s</sup> Mercure historique & politique, 1711. Memoires historiques & chronologiques,

AT the very beginning of the year, that is, in the month Negotia- of January, the congress for a general peace, the preliminations for a ries of which were already settled, was opened, with the peace, upon

<sup>t</sup> Histoire des Campagnes du Duc de Vendosme, Mercure historique & politique; Histoire generale d'Espagne. <sup>u</sup> LARREY, tom. iii. p. 309. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, BURNET'S History of his own Times. <sup>w</sup> Memoires de LA TORRE, LAMBERTI, QUINCY, LIMIERS, BURNET. <sup>x</sup> Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne, QUINCY, tom. vi. p. 589. Histoire des Campagnes du Duc de Vendosme, pag. 328.

which
king Charles
the third quits Catalonia.
A. D.
1712.

accustomed ceremonies, at Utrecht <sup>y</sup>. King Philip had named the marquis of Monteleon, and other plenipotentiaries; but they did not repair thither, as being apprised, that, till the king's title was acknowledged, they could not have been received. The difficulties of raising money were to the full as great as they had ever been; and perhaps it would have been a point too hard for all their politicians to accomplish, if, in the month of March, the galleons had not arrived at Cadiz, under the escort of Monsieur de Casse <sup>z</sup>. The king's necessities forced him to take a high indulto, which, though not very willingly, was paid, and enabled the duke of Vendosme to resume the military preparations, which had been suspended in a manner for some time for want of money. About this time the king disgraced the conde d'Aguilar, lieutenant-general and captain of his guards, knight of the Golden Fleece, and generally esteemed the best officer in Spain. This occasioned a great noise, and no small discontent, for his fidelity, his courage, and his conduct, were without reproach; his only fault lay in his temper; the king had supported him against the duke of Orleans and marshal Bezons, but he would not support him against the duke of Vendosme. He submitted with great duty; and, when he resigned his command, said, "As it is your majesty's pleasure, I am content; if it proves for your service, I shall rejoice." He retired to his own house, and spent the remainder of his days as a philosopher, and died as much beloved as he had always been esteemed <sup>a</sup>. The king's affairs in Catalonia went but indifferently: count Staremborgh had an army of 24,000 men, with which he formed the siege, or rather the blockade, of Gironne, defended by the marquis de Blancas, now marshal of France, for eight months, under the utmost extremity of famine, till at length the siege was raised <sup>b</sup>. As for the army of Spain, it was scarce ever in a condition to take the field, more especially after the death of the duke of Vendosme, which happened suddenly at Vignares, on the 11th of June; of an apoplexy, as some say, or, as others report, of an indigestion, arising from his eating too heartily of fresh fish. The king ordered him to be interred in the Escorial, with the same honours that had been paid to Don Juan of Austria <sup>c</sup>. One great cause of the inactivity of this campaign was, the desire the king had to see the English and Portuguese separated from count Starembergh's army ; which at length happened ; and then it was hoped that the Catalans would have submitted, but in that they were deceived.

<sup>y</sup> Histoire du Congrez & de la Paix d'Utrecht. <sup>z</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1712. Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>a</sup> Mercure historique & politique. <sup>b</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

<sup>c</sup> Mercure historique & politique, QUINCY, Histoire Militaire de Louis XIV. tom. vii. pag. 115. Memoires historiques & chronologiques.

ON the 18th of October lord Lexington arrived at Madrid<sup>d</sup>, and, on the 5th of November, the king, in the presence of his council, signed the act of renunciation<sup>e</sup> in the Cortes, or general assembly of the states. By this act he renounced, for himself, his heirs and successors, all pretensions to, and all power of inheriting, the crown of France, in favour of his brother the duke of Berry, his uncle the duke of Orleans, his cousin the duke of Bourbon, and the rest of the princes of the blood. On the 7th that renunciation was ratified and approved by the assembly of the states, and declared to be a fundamental law for regulating the succession to the dominions of Spain in all times to come. They likewise approved the entail made by that act on the house of Savoy, in case the royal family should become extinct, and the perpetual exclusion of the house of Austria. They farther took this opportunity of altering the rule of succession in another respect, and settled the crown on the next heir male ; whereas hitherto females, if nearest in blood, had been capable of succeeding<sup>f</sup>. By this solemn ratification of the king's act, the great obstacle was taken away that retarded the peace, the prospect of which, and the queen's safe delivery of Don Philip, afforded the court and the nation great satisfaction ; though they were still at a loss about Catalonia, where they were very unwilling to employ arms, if the possession of that country could have been recovered any other way ; as well to avoid provoking the allies, as to take from the Catalans any colour of being obliged to form themselves into a republic for their own security ; and it was chiefly with a view to this that the king published a general amnesty, without any reservation or exceptions<sup>g</sup>. The princess of Ursins still maintained herself in the favour of their catholic majesties, though she did not meddle so

*The king's
renunciation approved, and the rule of succession altered by the Cortes.*

<sup>d</sup> BURNET's History of his own Times, vol. ii. p. 612.

<sup>e</sup> Actes de la Paix d'Utrecht, tom. ii. p. 330. Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. viii. Part. i. p. 310. LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. vii. p. 528. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Mercure historique & politique, BURNET's History of his own Times, Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

<sup>f</sup> Corps Diplomatique, tom. viii. part. i. p. 313.

<sup>g</sup> Mercure historique & politique, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

much or so openly in public business. The king, however, promised, and procured for her, a principality in the Low Countries<sup>b</sup>; notwithstanding that, in the beginning of the year, he had by a solemn act<sup>i</sup> transferred the sovereignty of all the Spanish provinces to his electoral highness of Bavaria, in compensation for the great losses he had sustained by his steady attachment to his interests; and the great object of the court was, to get these points settled by the peace.

Mr. Orry brought back from France, who regulates the revenue effectually.

A. D. 1713.

IN order to answer all the great ends of government, there is nothing so requisite as to have the finances in good order. King Philip was sensible of this from the very moment he assumed the royal title to this time; and being also persuaded that nothing could contribute so much to the preservation of peace at home, or procuring respect abroad, as having this point once for all settled, he sent for Mr. Orry a third time out of France, and gave him full powers to regulate the whole revenue of the Spanish monarchy; which he did so effectually, and in so short a time, that he fixed it at forty millions for this year. He likewise framed the military establishment upon the foot of one hundred and twenty battalions and one hundred and thirty squadrons, exclusive of the household troops. He bought, repaired, and equipped, twenty-one men of war and frigates; he provided three hundred pieces of cannon, forty mortars, and prodigious quantities of powder, bullets, and bombs. These regulations were indeed attended with murmurs and complaints, against which the court shut their ears; and indeed the Spanish ministers and grandees were so much surpris'd, and so well pleased to see the monarchy in such a situation, after so long and so expensive a war, that they confessed it better for some individuals to suffer by the loss of old debts, and the introduction of new methods, than that Spain should continue in that distressed and dejected condition in which they had seen her for a long series of years<sup>k</sup>. The arrival of the galleons was another favourable incident, which, by fixing the indulto so high as eight per cent. produced a very considerable supply; and the duke of Albuquerque, who was just returned from his viceroyalty in the Indies, was obliged to lay down a round sum in gold, to prevent an inquiry into his administration. These circumstances, together with the regularity observed by the generality of the towns in paying their free gifts, when they saw that things were put into order, and that a like regularity was observed in all public payments, spread a spirit of firmness and tranquillity which was visible enough in the language and in the conduct of the ministers, during the negotiation and conclusion of the several treaties of peace by which this long and ruinous war had been ended, on terms much superior to what were expected but the very summer before. This brings us to speak of the first of these treaties concluded with Great Britain on the 13th of July<sup>1</sup>, according to the new stile, and which in fact was the ruling precedent for all the rest (D).

<sup>b</sup> Corps Diplomatique, tom. viii. Part i. p. 272. <sup>i</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par Voltaire, Corps Diplomatique, tom. viii. P. i. p. 288, 289. <sup>k</sup> Mercure historique & politique, A. D. 1713.

BY

<sup>1</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, Mercure historique & politique, Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. viii. P. i. p. 393. Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE, LAMBERT. Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. viii. p. 445.

(D) As soon as the preliminaries with Great Britain were signed, the kings Lewis and Philip looked upon the peace as made, and not without reason, for they were very sensible that the war in Spain had been made for some campaigns at the expence of Great Britain; and they were also morally certain, that, if it was carried on any longer, it must be carried on in the same way (6). For these reasons Philip was very forward to give that satisfaction which had been demanded on the part of queen Anne, which was the solemn renunciation, for himself and his family, of all rights to the crown of France; he published, therefore a declaration and decree, both dated on the 18th of July. In the former he gives his subjects to understand, that he had at length hopes of a peace; that these hopes proceeded intirely from the favour of Great Britain; and were attended with the demand of a renunciation either of his rights to the crown of Spain, or to that of France. He affirms, that his grandfather had dissuaded the latter; but that, from the moment it came under his consideration, he determined to prefer Spain, and not barely Spain, but a part of it, to France, and to all the crowns upon earth; that therefore, with the greatest chearfulness, and without the smallest mixture either of regret or complaint, he had subscribed the decree of renunciation which followed. In the decree he premises, that securing Europe from the danger that must result from the too great power of a monarch having the crowns of France and Spain on his head, was the source of this long war; and it was natural,

(6) Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Use of History, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par Voltaire.

therefore,

The substance of the treaty between the crowns of Spain and Great Britain.

By this treaty their majesties reciprocally acknowledged each other's titles; the catholic king recognized the protestant succession, as settled in the illustrious house of Hanover; revived and restored all the privileges the English nation had enjoyed in the reign of his uncle and predecessor; yielded to the crown of Great Britain, in full dominion and sovereignty, the town and fortress of Gibraltar, the island of Minorca, and the harbour and fortress of Port-Mahon, on condition that neither Jews nor Moors should be permitted to inhabit in either; that the Roman catholic religion should be permitted and protected in the latter; and that if either or both should be at any time sold or alienated by the crown of Great Britain, the crown of Spain should have a right of pre-emption. His catholic majesty farther granted to the subjects of Great Britain the Asiento de Negros for the space of thirty years, upon the terms, and according to the conditions, mentioned in a certain instrument, which was to have the like force and virtue as if verbally recited in the said treaty. The inhabitants of Catalonia, of all ranks whatsoever, were to have a general amnesty, with the intire and full possession of their

therefore, to provide in the fullest manner against it, previous to the conclusion of a peace; that, being sensible of the obligations he was under to the Spaniards both for giving him a crown, and for sacrificing their lives and fortunes to keep it upon his head, when, thro' two signal reverses of fortune, it was upon the point of falling, he thought himself obliged, as well in point of honour and out of gratitude, as from principles of affection, to comply with the instances made by the queen of Great Britain, in making, with the utmost chearfulness and sincerity, an authentic renunciation of his own rights, and those of his posterity, to the crown of France, in favour of his brother the duke of Berry, and his uncle the duke of Orleans (7). The like renunciations were made by those princes with respect to their rights to the crown of Spain; and those renunciations were fortified in the strongest manner possible, by the approbation and recognition of the Cortes in Spain, and by their registering the renunciations in France by the king's authority, and with his consent, in all the parliaments of that kingdom (8). It appears, however, clearly, that the British ministers did not so much rely upon the renunciations, as upon their being inserted in the treaty of peace, under the guaranty of the allies, who thereby acquired a right of making them good at all times by force of arms (9).

(7) Mercure historique & politique, Corps Universel Diplomatique, &c.

(8) Histoire generale d'Espagne, Le Siecle de Louis XIV. Mercure historique & politique.

(9) Lord Bolingbroke's Letters, published in the Report of the Secret Committee.

honours and estates, with all the privileges then enjoyed, or that might be thereafter granted to the inhabitants of the two Castiles, his majesty's most faithful and best-beloved subjects. The treaties of commerce between the two powers were renewed. The island of Sicily, at the special instance and request of her Britannic majesty, was yielded to his royal highness the duke of Savoy, but without a power of alienation, and upon condition that, in case the male line of the house of Savoy failed, it should return to the catholic king. This treaty was signed at Utrecht, by the duke of Osuna and the marquis of Monteleon on one side; and by the bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, and the earl of Stratford, her Britannic majesty's plenipotenaries, on the other.

By the treaty <sup>m</sup> with Victor Amadeus the second, duke of Savoy, which was signed the same day, at the same place, his catholic majesty declares, confirms, and renews, his several renunciations in respect to the crown of France, and those made by the princes of the blood in that kingdom, as also the new rule of succession, by which that prince and his family were called to the throne of Spain. He likewise yields and transfers, purely, simply, and irrevocably, to the said duke, to the princes his sons, their heirs male, and all the heirs male of the house of Savoy, the kingdom of Sicily, and all the islands adjacent, and dependent thereon; and promises to withdraw the marquis de los Balbases, then viceroy, and to give his royal highness possession, immediately after the ratification of the treaty, as also to maintain that possession, and to remit into his royal highness's power all the titles, papers, and documents, that concern the kingdom. On the other hand, his royal highness stipulates not to sell, yield, mortgage, exchange, or otherwise part with, the said kingdom, but to preserve the possession of it, till such time as it devolved to the crown of Spain for want of heirs male, or to a king of Spain of the house of Savoy. His catholic majesty likewise confirms all the cessions made to his royal highness by the emperor Leopold in Italy. To this treaty there is annexed an instrument of cession, subscribed by his catholic majesty on the 10th of June. There are likewise annexed two separate articles, by which his royal highness consents that this treaty shall be void, in case he opposes, directly or indirectly, the intentions of the king of Spain, before the conclusion of the general treaty of peace, as also in case he shall enter into any alliances contrary or prejudicial to the interests of his catholic majesty. We shall hereafter see what consequences these secret articles produced.

<sup>m</sup> Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens, tom. viii. P i. p. 389. 401. Mercure historique & politique, Le Siècle de Louis XIV. par VOLTARE, Memoires historiques & chronologiques, Histoire generale d'Espagne.

*Different sentiments of the Spanish nobility, upon the terms
of the peace.*

THUS Philip, after a tedious war, and many cruel reverses of fortune, became at last master of Spain and the Indies, by the consent of those who had most vigorously opposed him; as, on the other hand, the two crowns were constrained to dismember the Spanish monarchy, and make in effect a new treaty of partition. This, as it restored them to tranquillity, was extremely grateful to the bulk of the Spanish nation; though there wanted not some who complained of the dear rate at which they had purchased peace, and regretted that diminution of honour which the crown had sustained, notwithstanding they must have been sensible that the loss was inevitable, and that there was great reason to wonder that peace was obtained even upon these terms. Those, however, who did not carry their discontent so high, were not a little troubled at the consideration that many things yet remained unsettled; that, notwithstanding the emperor had the equivalent that was intended him in his hands, he still kept up his claim to the whole monarchy; that as yet the peace was not concluded with Portugal; and that the restitution of a great part of Catalonia was still in a state of uncertainty; so that, after all, the fire was only raked up in its ashes, and its flame might be easily rekindled by any accident that furnished it with fresh fuel. The court was also thoroughly satisfied of this, and very desirous of extinguishing it; but, however, judged very prudently, that great caution was necessary; and that though no time was to be lost, yet nothing ought to be precipitated, more especially as they were persuaded that their new friends were full as desirous as themselves to see this completed, and yet judged, as they did, that a matter of so great consequence ought not to be hurried.

*Convention for the immediate evacuation of the principality of Catalo-
nia.*

THE first, and indeed principal, point was, the bringing about the evacuation of Catalonia by the German troops; and it proved more easy than could have been expected, on account of those circumstances which determined both parties to concur in that measure, who could agree in nothing else. His imperial majesty was desirous of withdrawing his confort, and found it necessary likewise at that juncture to withdraw his troops. A little before the empress embarked, she communicated to the Catalans the emperor's resolution to continue the war, and not to depart from his claim to the Spanish monarchy. To which they returned a very zealous answer, answer, demanding, with the greatest warmth, his coming back to his faithful subjects, and promising to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in his service<sup>a</sup>. This was kept very secret at that time, and was in reality one great source of the misfortunes of the Catalans; for, within the compass of the same month, the emperor consented to a convention for evacuating Catalonia, and for the neutrality of Italy, in which it was stipulated, that the imperial troops should embark at such times, and in such manner, on board the English fleet, as should be most convenient to count Starembergh: that a general amnesty should be granted to all the Catalans without exception, and also to the inhabitants of Majorca: that count Starembergh should quit either Barcelona or Tarragona first, as he thought convenient, of which he should give notice to the Spaniards, that they might take possession of the place he quitted, immediately on the withdrawing of his troops; and that he should leave behind him whatever cannon or ammunition belonged to France or Spain. This convention<sup>b</sup> was of a very singular nature, since none of the parties took any title therein, but, when spoken of together, are called the powers at war; when separately, the power occupying, or the power retiring; and the due observance of all stipulated therein is guarantied by his most Christian majesty and her Britannic majesty. However, when the imperialists quitted Tarragona, they suffered the Miquelets, as count Starembergh's relation says, to make themselves masters of the place; which indeed they attempted, and in which they were very near succeeding; but the archbishop and the magistrates, foreseeing what the consequences would be, and thinking they had made sacrifices enough already, dispatched an express to the marquis Grimaldi, lieutenant-general of his catholic majesty's forces, who ordered the marquis de Lede to march with six battalions and seven squadrons, to secure that city, as he did, and was received by the inhabitants with all the marks of joy imaginable<sup>c</sup>. It was with this marquis of Grimaldi that count Starembergh had signed a convention<sup>d</sup>, dated the 22d of June, relative to the evacuation, in which it was stipulated, that the Catalans should be at free liberty to send a deputation to the duke de Popoli, whom the king had appointed their viceroy; but it does not appear that

<sup>a</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siècle XVIII. p. 400.      <sup>b</sup> Mercure historique & politique.      <sup>c</sup> Me-

moires Historiques & chronologiques, LIMIER, Histoire de Louis XIV.      <sup>d</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne, & aut. supra citat.

they made any use of it, but, on the contrary, count Staremborgh's relation expressly says, that he left the emperor's flags flying on Montjuic, and in the principal posts of Barcelona <sup>s</sup>.

The commons of Barcelona seize that city, and refuse to acknowledge the new government.

IN the mean time those who were invested with the government of this province employed their agent, the count de Ferran to solicit Great Britain and Holland for assistance, representing in very strong terms the promises of support that had been made them from time to time by the maritime powers; and, according to the prayer of his memorials, both the queen and the states general did interpose on their behalf. The states, however, gave out commissions for 20,000 men: took the Spanish troops of king Charles, that were left behind, into their pay, as they likewise did some Palatines, and their officers; appointed generals of horse and foot, and took all other measures possible for a vigorous defence<sup>t</sup>. It is not easy to discover what their real intentions were; the general notion throughout Europe was, that they had a mind to render themselves an independent republic, after the example of Holland, which had been more than once in their heads before; but of this there is no kind of proof: on the contrary, from the language of their public acts, it is manifest they would be understood to mean, that they still considered the emperor as king of Spain, and themselves as his subjects; and therefore their conduct ought to be referred, if not to secret assurances, yet at least to expectations and hopes of succour and support from him; which is so much the more likely, as his imperial majesty procured, or, as the Spaniards say, extorted, the cardinal's hat for the bishop of Barcelona, who was the principal author of these martial resolutions<sup>u</sup>. The nobility and the clergy were of another mind, and were desirous of submitting, not only as it seemed to be the sole measure they had left, but also in point of prudence, that they might reap the benefit of the good offices of the maritime powers. In this, however, they were not able to carry their point.

Declare war against the crowns of France and Spain, and all

As soon as the court of Madrid had taken their measures for reducing the place in case of resistance, the duke de Polignac, in quality of general of the army in the principality of Catalonia, summoned the city of Barcelona to open her gates on the 29th of July, on pain of being considered as obstinate rebels; to which the deputation answered, that their

<sup>s</sup> Mercure historique & politique.

<sup>t</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle XVIII. tom. viii. p. 411.

<sup>u</sup> Le Siecle de Louis XIV. par VOLTAIRE.

city, and the whole principality, persisted in their resolution treated as of continuing the war, in virtue of that fidelity which they rebels by had always borne to their sovereign w. This certainly was the latter. very explicit. However, they explained themselves farther, by making an attempt upon Tarragona, in which they miscarried; and at last, upon the 21st of September, they publicly declared war by sound of trumpet against both France and Spain; from which time hostilities were committed on both sides, and the Spaniards took all the precautions possible to block up Barcelona, as far as it was in their power <sup>x</sup>. Lord Lexington, who was still at Madrid with the character of the queen of Great Britain's ambassador extraordinary, renewed his solicitations in favour of the Catalans; and says in his memorial, that it was not consistent with the honour or conscience of his mistress to leave a nation, whom the course of the war had brought into her interests, in a worse condition than she found it; and therefore pressed the king, in consideration of that friendship which God had been pleased to restore between their majesties, to grant those unhappy people their pardon and their privileges. In answer to this memorial, the Spanish ministers insisted upon the treaty, and the offers that had been made them of a general amnesty, which they had refused. After this, when lord Lexington was on the point of his departure, he wrote, with the consent of the court of Spain (tho' the contrary seems to be insinuated in the letter itself) to the Catalans; in order to persuade them to accept the amnesty, that it might be in his power to intercede for them farther, which he assures them he was inclined to do, tho' their answer should not reach his hands till he had quitted Madrid, and was come to Lisbon <sup>y</sup>; but it does not appear what effect this letter had, or whether it had any; but about this time his catholic majesty solicited the queen, or at least her ministers, very strongly, to permit some of her ships of war, that were in the Mediterranean, to assist in shutting up the port of Barcelona, and this under pretence that it was a point of no great consequence to the commerce of Great Britain, inasmuch as the Catalans, in their desperate circumstances, had solicited the Moors, and particularly the Algerines, for assistance <sup>z</sup>.

SUCH was the situation of things at the close of this year, Reasons for which brings us to a conclusion of the general history of concluding

<sup>w</sup> Mercure historique & politique, Hist. generale d'Espagne, QUINCY, Hist. Milit. de Louis XIV. LIMIERS.      <sup>x</sup> LARREY.

<sup>y</sup> LAMBERTI, Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Siecle xviii. tom. viii, p. 406—409.

here the modern history of the Spanish monarchy.

Spain, since, tho' the treaties with the United Provinces and Portugal were not concluded and signed within the compass of it, yet the principal points were settled, and the king was acknowledged; and the reader will find a full account of both in their proper places. He was also so happy as to have another son born this year, viz. the infant Don Ferdinand, on the 23d of September, who afterwards succeeded to the crown of Spain<sup>a</sup>, and his affairs in much better condition than, after so tedious and consuming a war, he could well have expected; at the same time that he saw himself courted by his neighbours; and found that the war, in which the emperor persisted against France, delivered him from all apprehensions of seeing himself attacked in his own dominions by so powerful a competitor. He saw the duke of Savoy in possession of the kingdom of Sicily, and from that circumstance attached to his interests; in favour of which likewise other Italian powers had pretty clearly explained themselves; and, which was a circumstance perhaps more satisfactory than all the rest, he found himself the first complete monarch of Spain in a strict and proper sense, since under all his predecessors it was not so much a monarchy as a conjunction of several kingdoms under one chief; and tho' the difference may not seem great to strangers, yet it was without question a matter of prodigious importance in itself, as the removing the difficulties with which it was attended could scarcely have proved practicable at any other juncture than that in which it was done, and by which alone the king endeared himself so much to his subjects of Castile, that, tho' the first prince of his house, and a stranger by birth, he found them not only more tractable and compliant, but really more obedient, and more zealous for his service, than for any of those who had reigned before him, as will manifestly appear when we come to resume this history in the conclusion.

<sup>a</sup> Histoire generale d'Espagne.

7

